Acknowledgements

This dissertation could not have been written without the support of colleagues, students, friends, family and last but not least my respondents, to whom I would like to express my appreciation.

First of all, I would like to thank my colleagues at the Institute of Cultural Anthropology and Development Sociology at Leiden University. It is wonderful and inspiring to work with you. I especially want to thank my adviser Wasif Shadid, who has been an important source of inspiration for my scientific development. Special thanks to Peter Pels as well, for inviting me back as a lecturer to the Institute of Cultural Anthropology and Development Sociology and for all his thought provoking scientific discussions. Furthermore, I thank my students. Teaching you about conducting and analysing social research teaches me a lot about you, about myself and about Dutch society in general. I hope that I can inspire and motivate you to think critically and ask the appropriate questions.

I am profoundly grateful to my respondents, who took time to be interviewed and trusted me with their views and doubts regarding the subject of this thesis. Without them this research would not have been possible. I also want to thank Kim van Drie, Iris van Genuchten and Rosalinde Spitters for assisting me with the interviews for this research.

My friends and family also deserve my thanks for their mental support. While many of you did not contribute to this dissertation directly, you made it possible by always sharing and stimulating my and your own curiosity about the world around us. I can only mention some of you here: Bart de Boer, Stephan de Roode, Ellen de Bruin, Beatrijs van Agt, Jan Kees Hordijk en Marijn van der Waa. Renske, you deserve special thanks for your support and patience. Now this dissertation is finished we'll once again have time to go cycling. Last but not least I want to thank my parents. Jos en Mechtild, thank you for always expressing your confidence in me and for the way you taught me to look at the world.

Curriculum vitae

Igor Boog was born on the 15th of August 1970 in Eindhoven, the Netherlands. From September 1982 until June 1988 he followed secondary education (VWO) at the Dalton Scholengemeenschap in Voorburg. He studied Cultural Anthropology and Development Sociology at Leiden University, and worked as a journalist in the Middle East. He received his doctorandus title from Leiden University (2004) for a thesis on activist social movements, based on extensive field research in the Middle East.

In the Netherlands, Igor Boog worked as a researcher and deputy director of the Dutch national expertise centre on discrimination (Art.1). He participated in and supervised research projects (combining quantitative and qualitative methods) on equal treatment and discrimination, commissioned by the Dutch government and the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA).

Igor Boog joined the Institute of Cultural Anthropology and Development Sociology at Leiden University in 2010. He is responsible for the courses on statistics and data-analysis, and lectures about interethnic relations, citizenship and social identity.
