

Universiteit
Leiden
The Netherlands

Varieties of secularisation in English and Dutch public and international law

Somos, M.

Citation

Somos, M. (2014, May 27). Varieties of secularisation in English and Dutch public and international law. Retrieved from <https://hdl.handle.net/1887/25843>

Version: Corrected Publisher's Version

License: Licence agreement concerning inclusion of doctoral thesis in the Institutional Repository of the University of Leiden

Downloaded from: <https://hdl.handle.net/1887/25843>

Note: To cite this publication please use the final published version (if applicable).

Cover Page

Universiteit Leiden

The handle <http://hdl.handle.net/1887/25843> holds various files of this Leiden University dissertation

Author: Somos, Mark

Title: Varieties of secularisation in English and Dutch public and international law

Issue Date: 2014-05-27

CHAPTER FOUR

BEYOND MINIMALISM: DIDACTIC SECULARISATION IN GROTIUS'S DE VERITATE

Is there a syllable of it less truth, because I am sorry for the publishing it?

Selden, Reply to Dr. Tillesley's Animadversions upon M. Seldens History of Tithes, c. 1620

En dankt, ach Heer, het is te Loevestein gemaakt.

Grotius, Bewijs, 1622

Summary

This chapter offers an interpretation of De veritate that resolves its ostensible self-contradictions and uncovers its coherence when it is read as a text designed primarily with an irenic purpose, a didactic method, and having a secularising effect regardless of the author's intention.

IV.1 Introduction

Readers of De veritate seldom miss one or more oddities and apparent self-contradictions in Grotius's arguments for the truth of Christianity. The contemporary reception and eighteenth-century afterlife of De veritate was remarkably contentious. Among recent readers, Heering and Klein point out the absence of Creation and the Trinity from the list of Christian doctrines to be proved, in contrast, for instance, with Mornay's De veritate or Grotius's own Meletius.²⁶⁹ Günther Lottes describes Grotius's arguments as "garbled," "verging on the ridiculous," and unwittingly weakening his own arguments.²⁷⁰ Here, it is the "unwittingly" part of this acute assessment that I wish to dispute.

²⁶⁹ J.P. Heering, Hugo Grotius as Apologist for the Christian Religion: A Study of His Work De veritate religionis christianae (1640) (Leiden, 2004), Grotius, 102-3. Dietrich Klein, "Hugo Grotius's Position on Islam as Described in De veritate religionis Christianae, Liber VI," in Martin Mulsow and Jan Rohls (eds.), Socianism and Arminianism: Antitrinitarians, Calvinists and Cultural Exchange in Seventeenth-Century Europe (Brill, 2005), 149-73, at 159.

²⁷⁰ "The Transformation of Apologetical Literature in the Early Enlightenment. The Case of Grotius' De veritate," presented at The true faith? A cosmopolitan project in the early Enlightenment. Potsdam, 10 Feb., 2012.

A systematic survey of the positive doctrinal content of Christianity that Grotius offers suggests that these oddities and self-contradictions are neither isolated, nor accidental. Instead of reducing Christianity to minimal tenets accessible to all reasonable men, including Jews, Muslims, and polytheists, Grotius subverts the reasonability of every core Christian doctrine. A possible explanation is that De veritate was designed to gradually lead readers away from an expectation of reasonable proofs to sola fide in a minimal set of Christian doctrines, to which standards of human reason cannot apply. This rhetorical strategy, and the legal genre of the work, are two reasons why De veritate does not readily fit into the mainstream of Christian apologetics, and exerts an ultimately secularising effect.

In the next four sections I will outline the ways in which Grotius implements this strategy in De veritate by examining what he regards as proofs of religious truth, how religious practice is evaluated, how to settle contentious dogmatic issues, and how to reconcile Providence with politics and free will. A shorter section on the insights we can glean from De veritate's reception precedes the conclusion, where several explanations for Grotius's strategy are explored.

IV.2 Proofs of religious truth

IV.2.1 Standards of good religion: ethics, rewards, and the violence of conquest

Grotius posits two criteria for a good religion: ethical rules for life, and the promise of reward.²⁷¹ Christianity, unlike paganism or Judaism, meets both conditions, and adds to them the persuasive power of miracles.²⁷² Turning moral goodness into a pre-religion standard against which Judaism, Islam, paganism and Christianity can be measured, and choosing individual reward as the other criterion, already carry secularising implications. Gone for now is the idea that human nature, reason, the love of God, God's free gift, or a combination of these, constitute the necessary and sufficient cause of true faith, and that the self-serving expectation of rewards is dispensable.

²⁷¹ Grotius, De veritate religionis christianae (2nd ed., Leiden, 1629), IV.149-50, translated in Symon Patrick, The truth of Christian Religion: In Six Books Written in Latin by Hugo Grotius... (London, 1689), IV.ix.120. Unless indicated otherwise, references are to the 1629 second edition, followed by the corresponding page number in this English translation. On Patrick, see J. van den Berg, "Between Platonism and Enlightenment. Simon Patrick (1625-1707) and his Place in the Latitudinarian Movement," in van den Berg, Religious Currents and Cross-Currents: Essays on Early Modern Protestantism and the Protestant Enlightenment, eds. J. de Bruijn, P. Holtrop, E. van der Wall (Brill, 1999), 133-48. Note that in the 1629 ed., IV.139, Grotius states that prayers to evil spirits are useless, because their worshippers cannot be certain that the evil spirits will deliver. This strikingly mercenary account of religion makes no reference to the comparative morality of Christianity and that of evil spirit-worship; only to rewards.

Other editions are referenced when the reader may benefit from tracing the connection between a different edition and political or intellectual events (such as Counter-Reformation criticisms, or the presence or otherwise of an argument in the 1627 first edition) or in the case of relevant textual changes, including Grotius's own revisions, commentaries and annotations by editors, such as Jean Leclerc (1657-1736), and similar edition-specific features.

²⁷² 1629 ed., V.196, mispaginated as 146, V.xviii.157; and 1689 tr., V.211-2, V.xxiii.168.

If my main thesis is true, and this shift of emphasis to self-interest serves an overarching didactic purpose, Grotius's choices remain striking. Among the well-established apologetic traditions one that it discards is that miracles have ceased with Christ precisely because for true believers faith must outweigh the attraction of rewards. An alternative onus probandi in early modern Protestant theology invoked both OT and NT language on the circumcision of the heart, and the laws written in man's conscience. On the rare occasion when Grotius does invoke this standard of proof in De veritate, his legal analogy is to a king who replaces sundry laws with a common legal system for the sake of uniform government.²⁷³ Even here, Grotius interprets the law written in men's minds, according i.a. to Jer. 31:31, as a positive divine law, not a natural law discoverable by all.²⁷⁴ The law written in all hearts serves in De veritate not as a proof of Christianity, but as a doctrine dependent on demonstrating the truth of Christianity by other means.

Pacifism or bellicosity is an important litmus test of a religion's ethical value for Grotius. Islam, ancient Greece and Rome are found wanting,²⁷⁵ allowing Grotius to present pacifism – as well as monogamy – among the exclusive proofs of the truth of Christianity.²⁷⁶ “The spread of Christianity,” section 5.2 below, will show how Grotius comprehensively subverts this claim by building a contradictory picture of the worldly triumph of Christianity that closely follows his repeated condemnations of Islam for the violence of its expansion, proving its untruth as a religion.²⁷⁷ In sum, even if boiling down the truth of Christianity to ethics and reward were unproblematic, De veritate would still need not only close analysis, but also radical re-evaluation.

IV.2.2 Testimony and consensus

Grotius subscribed to the Aristotelian distinction between different types of evidence, and the necessity of matching them to the subject matter. Ethics may not be susceptible to the same type of proof as geometry – although universal consensus on an ethical subject, should it ever occur, may come close to geometry.²⁷⁸ Since there is no universal consensus regarding the ²⁷³ See also 1629 ed., V.168, or V.vii.310 in the 1675 Amsterdam edition: in creating universally binding laws Christ abrogated Mosaic laws, which applied only to Jews, the same way a king abolishes municipal statutes. Borrowing later from Tacitus, Grotius uses the same analogy to explain epistemic humility: just as it is perilous to inquire into kings' counsel, so it is unwise to conjecture into God's meaning. 1675 ed., III.xii.221-2.

²⁷⁴ 1629 ed., V.170-1; 1689 tr., V.vii.137-8. See also Jesus acquiring regal potestas, including the authority to make law: 1629 ed., V.167; 1675 ed., V.vii.308; 1689 tr., V.vii.135.

²⁷⁵ 1689 tr., II.xiv.

²⁷⁶ 1689 tr., II.xv.

²⁷⁷ Later restatements of Islam's violence are at the beginning of Book VI, and also VI.vii.

²⁷⁸ See i.a. 1629 ed., 96-99. Also Ioannis Evrigenis, Images of Anarchy: The Rhetoric and Science in Hobbes's State of Nature (Cambridge, forthcoming).

truth of Christianity (even if there is consensus about the existence of the divine), the methods of establishing probability that are used in law offer the only alternative to using non-rational sources of authority to verify the claims of Christianity.²⁷⁹ Given Grotius's own positions on the limits of human understanding and the errors caused by these epistemic limits – ignorance of natural causes, undue reliance on human authority, errors of translation, transmission, and the like – the human testimonies and the reasonability of those who transmit and receive them are strikingly inadequate to support the theological onus probandi of the truth of Christianity that he chooses to place on them.

Grotius's apologetics rely extensively on the power of human testimony.²⁸⁰ He states this reliance pointedly and often. While the invocation of witnesses and testimonies is a staple of Christian apologetics, it is unusual to see the emphasis and authority that Grotius ascribes to them. In addition, Grotius frequently uses pagan rituals and accounts as 'hostile testimonies' to prove Christian doctrines. However, the net effect is the relativisation of these doctrines and the debasement of their claim to truth. This is illustrated by Grotius's favoured method of comparing these rituals and accounts as equals, with the Christian ones being far from unique in either substance or authority.²⁸¹

Grotius also recognises consensus as a source of authority. Astrology's groundlessness is demonstrated by the absence of consensus regarding any of its claims.²⁸² Grotius's comparison of the credibility of the Muslim with the Christian claim to an uncorrupted divine text concludes with the extraordinary thought that had there been no reports of the sayings and teachings of Jesus and Muhammed, equity would have dictated that the consensus of their followers determine the doctrinal content and validity of their respective religions.²⁸³

²⁷⁹ See Henk Nellen, "Minimal Religion, Deism and Socinianism: On Grotius's Motives for Writing De Veritate," Grotiana 33 (2012), 25-57, at 37, 57, for an excellent discussion of probability and De veritate. My point, on Grotius's use of probability specifically in legal reasoning in De veritate, is complementary, and does not detract from the validity of the intellectual lineage that Nellen traces through Mersenne, Cherbury and beyond.

²⁸⁰ Passages are too numerous to list, but see e.g. De veritate, II.v for the steps of Grotius's method and the weight of authority he assigns. II.vii: Christ's resurrection would not be believed by anyone, had it not been for eye-witnesses and ocular testimony. This leaves little room, for instance, for proving the truth of Christianity from the gift of faith, or from a combination of OT prophecies about the Messiah's resurrection with signs from the life of Jesus suggesting that he is Christ. Not in the 1629, but later editions of De veritate, Book III verifies Christian miracles performed at sepulchres by referring to Porphyry as a hostile witness. III.vii.213 in the 1675 ed. Also see V.xxii (1627 ed. V.182; 1689 tr. V.167). Islam is refuted because the miracles reported in the Bible are attested by better witnesses than the miracles of Mohammed; therefore the Bible is a better source of Law. 1627 ed., VI.191. 1689 tr., VI.v.176.

²⁸¹ See esp. De veritate, I.xv. There is an interesting discussion in book III, where Grotius explains that eye-witnesses to biblical events have the same authority as the witnesses that Tacitus, Suetonius, and other historians relied on. 1629 ed., III.106. On the secularising effects of historicising exegesis see Somos, Secularisation, chapter II, and 414-6 for cases in Grotius's De iure praedae.

²⁸² 1629 ed., IV.151-2 (ending "...ut nihil in ea certi reperitur, praeter hoc ipsum, certi esse nihil."); 1689 tr., IV.xi.122.

²⁸³ 1629 ed., VI.220; 1689 tr., VI.iii.174.

The historical context of De veritate is of paramount importance in understanding Grotius's seemingly self-contradictory claims concerning the existence and absence of a broad or universal consensus among Christians regarding the essence of their faith. The range of vehement and high-visibility debates surrounding biblical exegeses germane to however minimalist a notion of Christianity one entertained, and the absence of consensus among Christians about the biblical text and its meaning, were particularly striking in the decades when De veritate was written, and rewritten. The textual evidence for the doctrines of individual salvation, the nature of Jesus, and the status of rituals, practices and church hierarchy, was fiercely contested not only among theologians but throughout society, from the highest ranks of church, cities, and state, to millenarian settlements and movements sweeping the countryside.

In Grotius's framework for comparing testimony, textual integrity and consent as sources of authority for religious truth, and with the inadequate or counterproductive evidence he chose to present, the doctrinal content of Christianity is radically challenged, or at the least fails to emerge as evidently more compelling than Judaism or Islam.²⁸⁴ Although I think this would go too far, one could nevertheless cogently sustain the interpretation that the radical doctrinal disagreement among Christians that constitutes the immediate historical context in which De veritate was written appears in Grotius's critique of astrology (III.xiv, IV.v and xi), and the choice of his evidence and the features of his comparative framework reveal a similarly profound epistemic scepticism about both – without negating in any way Grotius's possible opinion that unreasoned faith is justified in Christianity, but not in astrology.

IV.2.3 Miracles

Grotius's unusual treatment of miracles as the ultimate proof of a religion's truth is suspect for at least seven reasons.²⁸⁵ Firstly, it contravenes all the traditions that emphasise faith instead, including those that build the distinction between the Jews and the Christians on the latter's comparative and meritorious dependence on faith, after miracles had ceased with Christ. Further, the insistence that miracles are the effective way of convincing man of religious truth de-prioritises time-honoured philosophical arguments for the existence of God, such as the ²⁸⁴ For instance, Grotius praises the credibility of the OT Jewish authors in the same terms as the NT authors' (e.g. 1629 ed., III.127-8), with the one difference that he does not attribute simplicity and lack of learning to OT authors. Likewise, the argument for the NT's textual integrity, treated below in section V.1, is restated for the OT on III.129-30 of the 1629 ed.

²⁸⁵ 1629 ed., V.160 ("Neque enim potest Deus dogmati per hominem promulgato auctoritatem efficacius conciliare, quam miraculis editis."); 1689 tr., V.ii.129. That Grotius's reliance on miracles is highly unusual has been noticed i.a. by Heering, Grotius, 90, 105. No comparable emphasis can be found in Mornay or Meletius. Calvin regards miracles as unimportant, because they belong to a chapter in providential history that was closed by Christ.

ontological argument, the argument from design, or the appeal to the universality of conscience. The stated intention of De veritate is to convince reasonable men of the truth of Christianity. Prioritising miracles over philosophy is not an obviously advantageous method to achieve this.

The second warning sign about Grotius's intention is that he praises miracles often in Book V, addressed to the Jews. Out of his four target audiences (Christians, Jews, Muslims, and pagans), Grotius chooses the Jews, the only group whose canonical miracles Christians also believe in. All OT miracles, like the burning bush, the signs to convince pharaoh to let the Jews leave Egypt, and so on, are parts of both the Jewish and the Christian religions. If divine miracles are to be used at all in Christian apologetics, then distinguishing between four audiences and addressing the Jews in particular with the argument for the superiority of Christian miracles, including those in the OT, is an unpromising way to proceed, with a high risk of becoming counterproductive to the alleged demonstration.²⁸⁶

The undue dependence on the Jewish tradition brings us to the logic of Grotius's argument. Lottes points out the oddity and unusualness of Grotius's "reverse argument" concerning miracles. This argument takes the following form: there exists a tradition reporting miracles; the tradition was started and perpetuated by trustworthy eye-witnesses and reasonable men; therefore the miracles must be true. In addition to the logical weakness of proving the eye-witnesses' reliability from the circular argument that their testimony would not have survived otherwise, in this part of De veritate the witnesses are Jews, and the unquestionable tradition that attests the historical truth of miracles – which in turn was to prove the truth of Christianity – is Jewish.²⁸⁷ This is indeed "remarkably idiosyncratic" for a Christian, and allows Heering to trace the argument to Faustus Socinus (1539-1604).²⁸⁸ It was, however, also a well-established argument in Judaism, used extensively i.a. by Maimonides (1135-1204) and also known as 'the Kuzari principle.' The fact that Maimonides' Guide to the Perplexed is directly cited in De veritate, and there is evidence of Grotius and his circle reading Halevi's (c. 1075-1141) Kuzari long before the 1660 Buxtorf edition, suggests that this pillar of ²⁸⁶ Grotius's concluding summary of Book V restates the emphasis on the miracles of Christianity, which should convince the Jews. 1629 ed., V.211-2; 1689 tr., V.xxiii.168.

²⁸⁷ The weight put on the Jewish connection to prove Christianity is also brought out by the contrast with Grotius's treatment of Islamic miracles. De veritate, VI.v: Islam is refuted because the miracles reported in the Bible are attested by better witnesses than the miracles of Mohammed; therefore the Bible is a better source of Law. 1627 ed., VI.191; 1689 tr. VI.v.176.

²⁸⁸ Heering, Grotius, 106.

the Judeo-Christian apologetic tradition is at least as likely a candidate as Socinus to be the source of Grotius's argument on miracles.²⁸⁹

Fourthly, in addition to subverting OT miracles in particular, and placing all Christian miracles on doubtful foundations, Grotius refutes the validity of miracles in several other ways that cannot but apply to Christian miracles as well. The reduction of some miracles to the witnesses' ignorance of natural science, such as optical illusions and the power of magnets, was a well-established but no less powerful criticism in the early seventeenth century.²⁹⁰ Grotius's attribution of false miracles to priestly cunning, deceit, and vested interest in entrenching popular delusions, foreshadows eighteenth-century opinions.²⁹¹ It is also worth noting that Grotius does not debunk all pagan miracles, but allows that evil spirits in collusion with pagans performed real ones.²⁹²

Grotius's next step is to classify God's complicity in real pagan miracles, and God's independent performance of miracles that do not reveal but conceal the truth of Christianity, as deceit of the same kind. This may be justified legally as divine forms of punishment for treason; but it sits uneasily with most possible formulations of the doctrines of divine beneficence, grace, and providence.

Neither need any Man wonder why God suffered some marvels to be wrought by evil Spirits among the Gentiles, seeing they deserved to be cheated with such illusions, who so long time had forsaken the worship of the true God.²⁹³

The alternative explanation of biblical reports of non-divine miracles, namely that God allowed pagans and evil spirits to directly perform miracles as part of his providential plan to bring ²⁸⁹ The Kuzari principle is described i.a. in De veritate, I.xiii, I.xvi, V.ii, and used in I.xv (where the historicity of Moses proves the truth of miracles); II.ii, II.vii for Christ's resurrection, where the act of appealing to witnesses itself is also considered a sign of veracity, etc. For more details and related texts using this principle, including Cunaeus's Sardi venales and De republica Hebraeorum, see Somos, Secularisation, 348-52. For praises of Maimonides' Guide from 1605 onward by members of the Leiden Circle see Jason P. Rosenblatt, Renaissance England's Chief Rabbi (Oxford, 2006), 79-80, 79fn11.

²⁹⁰ 1629 ed., IV.145. "Sunt & alia, quæ admirationem tantum sui conciverunt apud ignaros rerum naturalium, præcipue occultarum proprietatum; quale quid accideret, si quis apud populos ejus rei ignaros magnete ferrum duceret..." 1689 tr., IV.viii.117.

²⁹¹ Justin Champion, "'Socinianism Truly stated': John Toland, Jean Leclerc and the Eighteenth-Century Reception of Grotius's De Veritate," Grotiana 33 (2012), 119-43.

²⁹² This is repeated as the premise of the section, Malos spiritus adoratos à paganis probatur, & ostenditur quā id sit indignum, 135-9 in the 1629 ed., Book IV.

²⁹³ 1689 tr., IV.viii.118. 1629. ed, IV.146-7: "Neque est, quod miretur quisquam, passum esse summum Deum, ut mira quædam à pravis Spiritibus ederentur, cum deludi talibus præstigijs meriti essent, qui à veri Dei cultu pridem defecerant." The pagan miracles' breach of human laws is in the preceding sentence. In the same context, Grotius describes the pagan attribution of miracles to humans and natural phenomena as the legal crimes of high treason and rebellion against God, on IV.138 and 140 of the 1629 ed.

impious men like Vespasian to power, and punish the Jews, is more conventional.²⁹⁴ However, this explanation is not only abandoned in favour of acknowledging pagan miracles as genuine, but also explicitly denied in De veritate II.vii, where Grotius states that God would not deceive men, particularly not through miracles.

In contrast with his treatment of miracles performed for pagans by evil spirits, Grotius challenges both the truth content and validity of Mohammed's miracles, because they do not conform to the universal ethical norms against which, as all reasonable men must agree, the verity of compared religions must be measured. Jesus' miracles, according to Grotius, were humane and appealing to those who care about this-worldly rewards. Mohammed's were frivolous and magician-like, starting with the case of the dove that flew to his ear.²⁹⁵ The parallel with Noah's dove in Genesis 8 is hard to escape.

Note that unlike many contemporary Christians and Hobbes, in De veritate Grotius does not hold that miracles have ceased with Christ. De veritate I.xvii, for instance, is an answer to those who wonder why miracles are not seen now. Given the preponderance of the general early modern Christian position – in Catholic, Calvinist and other varieties – that miracles have ceased with Christ, and consequently faith has become an even more important duty and gift, it is surprising to see Grotius avoid this position altogether, and argue (somewhat unconvincingly) that God can still work miracles, but simply has not found it necessary lately. Seemingly anti-thetically to De veritate's stated aim, this also allows Grotius to accept Mohammed's and other miracles, reported after Christ's incarnation and ascension, as genuine. In sum, the fifth reason to question Grotius's prima facie claim to present miracles as evidence for Christianity is the unfavourable light cast on the Christian acceptance of miracles when they are compared with similar Islamic ones, which Grotius dismisses, and with genuine pagan miracles, performed by evil spirits and permitted by God in deceit.

Sixthly, Grotius posits an obviously non-existent consensus around Christian miracles. In Book III, he elaborates several salient arguments about miracles as evidence for the truth of ²⁹⁴ 1689 tr., IV.viii.118.

²⁹⁵ 1629 ed., VI.221, 1689 tr., VI.v.175. It is unclear where Grotius got this. One possibility is that he took Scaliger's note on Manilius, and adapted it to make this incredible story sound similar to Noah's, creating a parallel where none existed, for the purpose of didactic secularisation described here. G.J. Toomer, "Edward Pococke's Arabic Translations of Grotius, De Veritate," Grotiana 33 (2012), 88-105, at 92-3, 100. The link between the miracles of Noah and Mohammed would have also been readily suggested by the Doctrina Machumet. Klein, "Hugo Grotius's Position," 162. Toomer, "Edward Pococke's Arabic Translations," 103. To avoid alienating the Muslim audience, Pococke removed this passage in his translation of De Veritate. Johann Christoph Koecher, a keen student of De veritate and annotator of Leclerc's edition, also found the story of Mohammed's dove odd. See VI.v.297 in the 1807 Oxford edition of De veritate, which does not clearly distinguish Koecher's and Leclerc's annotations (but cf. the 1734 Hague issue of Leclerc's edition without Koecher's notes, where the note on doves is missing on VI.v.295-6). On Leclerc and Koecher see J.J.V.M. de Vet, "Jean Leclerc, an Enlightened Propagandist of Grotius' 'De Veritate Religionis Christianae,'" Nederlands archief voor kerkgeschiedenis 64 (1984), 160-95, at 164 and 195.

Christianity. One is that non-Christians have performed miracles, a point already discussed above. Another is that no one has doubted that Peter and other Apostles worked miracles.²⁹⁶ This is not true, as he and his readers knew. As discussed below, Grotius uses the same technique, namely to appeal to an obviously non-existing consensus, with regard to the textual integrity of the Bible, the credibility of the Apostles and first Christians as witnesses, and contemporary agreement about Christianity's core tenets.

The seventh reason to rethink the doctrinal vs. didactic value of Christian miracles that emerges from De veritate is that despite the clear and repeated emphasis on their status as one of the two proofs of Christianity (rewards and punishment being the other), neither the observation of natural miracles nor the acceptance of witnesses' reports of miracles are mentioned in the book's concluding summary. There, Grotius gives his readers an eight-fold evidence of true Christianity: faith, rendered efficacious by love; a moral way of life; the deprioritisation of rites; social concord; unity; epistemic humility; patient expectation; and proselytising. This list reinforces the interpretation of De veritate as an exercise in didactic secularisation, whereby the process of reading the book – in which sections are very clearly structured and echoed, yet the arguments shift – shepherds the mind from reason to faith.

IV.2.4 Oracles and prophecies

Grotius's refutation of pagan oracles is interesting. As in the case of miracles, he does not dispute that some oracles worked, and gives several reasons why. Firstly, some were ambiguously worded. Secondly, based on natural causes and probability, physicians and those learned in politics can make predictions that seem supernatural to non-specialists. Thirdly, God can use pagan mouthpieces, like Virgil or the Sybils, to prefigure truths of Christianity, without thereby approving paganism.²⁹⁷

One reason why this is problematic for the truth of Christianity is that Grotius uses the same premises to draw a different conclusion regarding Jewish oracles and prophecies. In Book III, 110-1 in the 1629 ed., he sets up an invalid, circular argument to show that these writings must be true, because although obscure at the time of writing, later events retrospectively prove them to have been divinely revealed.²⁹⁸ In addition to expressing a classic fallacy, this point also negates the argument that the lack of objections to the Christian interpretation of OT prophecies on the part of Hebrew writers, who also lived before the events that could have retrospectively proved these passages to be divinely inspired, validates these Christian interpretations of OT passages as true prophecies. Whether or not Christian history divides OT figures into Jews who were the true spiritual ancestors of Christians (Noah, David, etc.), and Jews who are merely ancestors of post-biblical Jews, the dilemma remains: either no Jew before Christ objected to these prophecies because they did not know their true meaning; or those who foresaw Christ did not object to the Christian interpretation because they did know their prophecies' true meaning. It is impossible to maintain both of Grotius's statements on OT prophecies, namely that lack of objections to OT prophecies' Christian interpretation indicates understanding, and that OT prophecies are validated by later events, of which the biblical authors and recorders of the prophecies were unaware.

²⁹⁶ 1629 ed., III.109-10.

²⁹⁷ 1629 ed., IV.148-9; 1689 tr. IV.ix.119.

²⁹⁸ Logical fallacies in De veritate are treated separately in Section 7.3 below.

That Grotius was aware that maintaining both statements at the same time was illogical is shown, for instance, in his treatment of pagan oracles, discussed in Section 2.4 above. The pagans who gave correct oracles and prophecies of future events that proved the truth of Christianity, without the pagans themselves knowing it, were incorrect in their paganistic interpretation. It is the same logic that would invalidate OT prophecies of NT events. Such OT prophecies are indispensable to the core points of De veritate. OT prophecies foretold not only Christ's coming (e.g. 1689 tr., V.xvii) but also the abolition of sacrifices (1689 tr., V.viii.141-2).

In Book V, Grotius begins an ingenious series of moves with the introduction that Christ abrogated Mosaic laws in the way a king ends a civil war among his subjects, by declaring new laws that apply across the country, and pardon those who obey.²⁹⁹ Grotius then announces that he will position the abolition of sacrifices, rites, holy days and outward ceremonies at the core of this series of arguments. Aimed ostensibly against the Jews who refuse to recognise Christ and the validity of his abrogation of Mosaic laws, this series serves as a stark reminder of the wars among Christians, as well as of the imperative to create religious peace among and within the United Provinces.³⁰⁰ Moreover, by placing his radical minimalism and deprioritisation of these aspects shared by Judaism and Christianity (rites and rituals, festivals, and so forth) in the framework of his demonstration of Christianity's superiority, Grotius puts any Christian reader who insists that these sacrifices are essential in the unenviable position of seeming to favour the Mosaic laws over Christ's.³⁰¹ In this section Grotius sets up the Jews as a straw

²⁹⁹ 1627 ed. 146; 1629 ed. V.171; 1675 ed. V.vii.311.

³⁰⁰ The series of radical minimalist arguments thus structured, starting with sacrifices, runs from V.146-159 in the 1627 ed.; 171-85 in the 1629 ed.; V.viii.313-V.xi.334 in the 1675 ed. The series is followed by an account of the Apostles' policy of toleration.

³⁰¹ In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries there was a well-established tradition of applying the trope of "Judaising seducer" to both Jesus's contemporaries who in retrospect seem to have veered too easily between Christian and Jewish beliefs, and to one's own Christian contemporaries who offered a rival biblical interpretation.

dummy, a common enemy to unite all Christians; and at the same time an enemy familiar and familial, one who should be pacified and persuaded, rather than vanquished. Grotius does not sacrifice what we would now call inter-faith irenicism to the success of his creation of a temporary outgroup against which disunited Christians may be reunited. Later, at the start of Book VI, we learn that Christians made the same error as the Jews. Soon after Constantine espoused their cause, they began to mistakenly regard rites and ceremonies as important. Disagreements about the specifics of unimportant ceremonies in turn gave rise to zealous partisanship.³⁰²

After the unsustainable refutation of pagan prophecies with the same argument with which he accepts Jewish prophecies, and the multi-step but clear strategy of playing off ritual-focused Jews against dogmatic Christians, Grotius's argument about the chronological sequence of prophecies is the third reason why his position on this doctrine offers at best dubious support for the truth of Christianity. In I.xvi, Grotius ridicules doubters of Jewish prophecies, like Porphyry, who consider for instance Daniel's prophecies to be anachronistically attributed to him after the foretold event has already taken place. Grotius's counterargument is that Hebrew writers would have objected if this were the case, just as Romans would have objected to works mis-attributed to Virgil. Given the number and ubiquity of early modern scandals and debates around forgeries, not least those ascribed to early Christian authors, this defense of prophecy is manifestly unsustainable. (One salient case is the fourth-century Acta Pilati, a source that Grotius invokes in De veritate II.ii to support the historicity of Jesus' death. Baronius accepted this source as a genuine official record and a validation of the historical Jesus, and was promptly ridiculed for it. When Grotius later invokes it in support, while pointing out that Christians like Eusebius made no reference to it, we find beyond doubt that he knew the inauthenticity of the evidence he was presenting, and that this proof of Christianity was chosen as either disingenuous or too lacunose and complicated for De veritate's stated intention of presenting clear and universally compelling justifications.)

Fourthly, by including Mexican and Peruvian prophecies in De veritate, I.xvi, and rendering his list of true prophecies comparative beyond the Abrahamic religions, Grotius effectively subverts the argument that they prove the unique truth of Christianity. Even if ancient pagan prophecies can be dismissed, and Jewish and Islamic prophecies can be made to support the truth of Christianity, native American prophecies of Spanish conquest both undermine Grotius's assertion that God could, but chooses not to, perform miracles; and

One way in which Grotius frames minimalism in De veritate is to historicise Christian rituals and group them with Jewish rituals, thereby exposing the non-minimalist to the dangerous accusation of "Judaising."

³⁰² 1627 ed., VI.185; 1689 tr. VI.170.

expand the scope of comparison beyond the range that could support the specific truth of Christ's incarnation.

A fifth reason to think critically about Grotius's use of oracles and prophecies in De veritate is that he concludes the same chapter, I.xvi on oracles and prophecies, with an apparent non sequitur on the value of public examinations of innocence, for instance ad tactum ignitorum vomerum. These were among the most ridiculed ancient and medieval customs in early modern Europe.³⁰³

IV.2.5 Simplicity

In De veritate, II.vii and IV.x we find Grotius using the simplicity of the Apostles to prove their honesty. II.v is one of several chapters that presents a curious contradiction to this formulation. Here Grotius presents the Apostles and the early Fathers as intelligent men who did careful due diligence to make sure that the events they reported were well-attested and stood up to several distinct epistemic tests of veracity.

The same topic repeats in II.xviii.185-6 of the 1675 edition, but with a different contradiction. Unlike the Greek moralisers, the early teachers of Christianity used only the plainest language, bereft of subtlety and, Grotius suggests, perhaps intelligence. The Peripatetics argued from natural history, the Stoics used logic (dialectica subtilitate), the Pythagoreans, mathematics, and Plato, Xenophon and Theophrastus had eloquence. They form the contrast to Grotius's portrait of the first teachers of Christianity. This is not quite the same as the wise simplicity that was often considered a Christian virtue, and a sign of truth.³⁰⁴

The theme of Christian simplicity as ignorance is repeated in Book III as an accusation that was levelled against witnesses to Christ's resurrection.³⁰⁵ It is a back-handed compliment at best when Grotius explains that their enemies did not call into question the witnesses' piety and way of life; only their learning. Moreover, even this back-handed compliment of their reliability is suspect. The emperor Julian, Lucian and others also objected to Christians' false piety, as Grotius knew very well. (Elsewhere, Grotius himself asserts that the simplex pietas of early Christians was gradually corrupted after Constantine and others began to favour Christianity.)³⁰⁶ But to drive the point about doubtful credibility home, Grotius closes this section by arguing that one sign of the gospels' credibility is that Peter allowed his triple denial ³⁰³ On Leclerc's criticism of the Acta Pilati and trial by ordeal in De veritate, see de Vet, "Leclerc," 176.

³⁰⁴ For Cunaeus's similar move in the 1612 Sardi venales from Erasmus's Christian folly to plain folly in Christianity, see Somos, Secularisation, 377-8; and 422-6 for an account of the same technique in Grotius's De iure praedae.

³⁰⁵ 1629 ed., III.108.

³⁰⁶ 1627 ed., 184. 1689 tr., VI. 169.

of Christ to be included. In a classic paradox, Grotius argues that Peter cannot be a liar, because he reports himself as one.

In Book V, Grotius develops a version of the Protestant simplicity argument to convince the Jews to accept Jesus. Applying the hermeneutics of simplicity, he calls on Jews to disregard the messianic prophecies they believe have yet to come true, because they are obscure or ambiguous. Understanding other prophecies, known as the closed books (libri clausi), requires divine help – therefore these cannot inform the common recognition of the Messiah.³⁰⁷ The scenario in which an entire people is directly assisted by God in understanding the revealed text correctly, as opposed to using reason to arrive at the right judgment, then at a consensus about the prophetic texts' meaning, is rejected. Grotius's skepticism concerning the possibility that God can directly reveal the text's true meaning to a whole people signals his disagreement with Christian chosen nation theorists, as well.

The fact that the impossibility of such a divine elucidation of meaning, and the consequent necessity of human reason as the common ground, are pervasive assumptions in De veritate, also reveal other acts of disagreement with Dutch Calvinists in the book. One relevant instance is in VI.ii, where Grotius criticises Islam for prohibiting that people read the holy book. The echoes of his criticisms of Counter-Remonstrants are loud, clear, and discussed elsewhere.³⁰⁸ The additional and complementary point here is that Grotius anchors sola scriptura and the freedom of conscience in bonitas divina which, rightly understood, prompts us to assume that despite all men's considerable epistemic limits, and uneven intellectual capacities within mankind, the road to salvation can be found through reason.³⁰⁹

IV.3 Religious practice

IV.3.1 Ceremonies and rites

According to Grotius, the message of the New Testament is primarily ethical. At best, rites are didactic tools; at worst, they produce idolatry through ignorance and misunderstanding. The distinction between kosher and non-kosher meats, for instance, is a foolish superstition.³¹⁰ So are festival days, including the Sabbath. (Further, Grotius notes that the Sabbath was observed in order to foster civic unity, and due to the pragmatic benefit of having a universal day of rest across the country.)³¹¹ Circumcision, the token of a covenant that has been replaced, is ³⁰⁷ 1627 ed. 169, 1689 tr., V.xviii.157.

³⁰⁸ I.a. in Heering, Grotius.

³⁰⁹ 1627 ed. VI.187; 1689 tr. VI.ii.172. For a relevant discussion between Mersenne and Ruars, see Nellen, "Minimal," 51.

³¹⁰ 1689 tr., V.ix.143.

³¹¹ 1689 tr., V.x.144-6.

superstitious enough to do more spiritual harm than good.³¹² Neither is it far-fetched to discover in one of Grotius's descriptions of Islam a veiled criticism of the Counter-Remonstrants:

This Religion altogether contrived for the shedding of blood, delights much in Rites and Ceremonies, and would be believed without all liberty of enquiry thereinto...³¹³

The non-tangential, indissoluble link that Grotius created between the truth of Christianity and the radical minimalisation of its rituals and ceremonies is a major reason for the broad and long-term popularity of De veritate.

IV.3.2 Sacrifices

An obvious reason to consider carefully Grotius's position on sacrifices is that even friendly and, in this case, unheeded critics like Episcopius and Vossius pointed out that Grotius's attribution of the institution of sacrifices to man, rather than God, is theologically untenable.³¹⁴ To undermine the superfluous and harmful doctrine of sacrifices, Grotius describes several cases where the ritual of sacrifice, which has never in itself pleased God, gave rise to superstition.³¹⁵ His etiology of superstition in Book V repeatedly emphasises a point, illustrated by this passage:

...Sacrifices are not in the number of those things which God desires for themselves or primarily; and that the People (a naughty Superstition creeping in, as is usual, by little and little among them) placed a great part of their Piety in them, and believed they made a sufficient compensation for their sins by Sacrifices: what wonder is it, if God at length take away a thing, which was not now in its own nature indifferent, but whose use was now become a Vice?³¹⁶

One also wonders whether Grotius is taking a swipe at the Synod of Dordt in this process. Compare Rejectio Errorum § IV in the Canons of Dordt, condemning those ³¹² 1689 tr., X.vi.147-8.

³¹³ 1689 tr., VI.ii.171-2. In 1627 ed., 186-7.

³¹⁴ Heering, Grotius, 14.

³¹⁵ 1629 ed., V.175, 1689 tr., V.viii.141.

³¹⁶ 1689 tr., V.viii.141.

Who teach that what is involved in the new covenant of grace which God the Father made with men through the intervening of Christ's death is not that we are justified before God and saved through faith, insofar as it accepts Christ's merit, but rather that God, having withdrawn his demand for perfect obedience to the law, counts faith itself, and the imperfect obedience of faith, as perfect obedience to the law, and graciously looks upon this as worthy of the reward of eternal life.

For they contradict Scripture: They are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Jesus Christ, whom God presented as a sacrifice of atonement, through faith in his blood (Rom. 3:24-25). And along with the ungodly Socinus, they introduce a new and foreign justification of man before God, against the consensus of the whole church.³¹⁷

The Dortian view of Christ meets Grotius's specific standards for misunderstanding and idolising a sacrifice quite well, just like his own view, as many have noticed, is remarkably close to the Socinian notion of Christ that is criticised here. Elsewhere, Grotius reminds his readers that prophecies have foretold the abolition of sacrifices.³¹⁸

IV.3.3 Adiaphora

In Book V, Grotius rejects the necessity of observing a whole range of religious practices fiercely debated in his time, from dietary restrictions to holy days. In concluding these sections, he expounds a view of the Apostles and the early church as gentle and tolerant. As long as followers believed in Christ's direct commands, "they easily suffered them to follow what course of life they pleased in matters of indifference" (rebus mediis),³¹⁹ and imposed no religious requirements whatever on strangers.

The distinction between necessary and unnecessary doctrines is a well-known mainstay in Grotius's irenicism, from his characterisation of Erasmus in the Parallelon to his late works.³²⁰ In De veritate, one load-bearing pillar of Grotius's distinction is that Jesus observed all the laws

³¹⁷ "Qui docent, 'Foedus illud novum gratiae, quod Deus Pater, per mortis Christi interventum cum hominibus pepigit, non in eo consistere, quod per fidem, quatenus meritum Christi apprehendit, coram Deo justificemur et salvemur; sed in hoc, quod Deus, abrogata perfectae obedientiae legalis exactione, fidem ipsam et fidei obedientiam imperfectam pro perfecta legis obedientia reputet, et vitae aeternae praemio gratiose dignam censeat.' Hi enim contradicunt Scripturae, Justificantur gratis, ejus gratia, per redemptionem factam in Jesu Christo, quem proposuit Deus placamentum per fidem in sanguine ejus. Rom. iii. 24, 25. Et cum impio Socino, novam et peregrinam hominis coram Deo justificationem, contra totius Ecclesiae consensum, inducunt."

³¹⁸ 1629 ed., V.175-6; 1689 tr., V.viii.141.

³¹⁹ 1689 tr., V.xii.148-9.

³²⁰ Heering, Grotius, 69. Somos, Secularisation, 289-91, 322, 386.

of Moses until the time came to abrogate those that were not universal, but given only to the Jews.

Now that part of the Law, the necessity whereof was taken away by Christ, contained nothing that was honest in its own nature: but consisted of things that were indifferent in themselves and consequently not immutable. For if those things had had in them any thing of themselves, why they should be done; then would God have prescribed them not to one, but to all People; and not after that Mankind had lived above the space of Two Thousand Years, but even from the beginning of all.³²¹

Here we see Grotius crafting the components of his eventual conclusion, namely that most laws and rites are inessential. Even though many rituals were prescribed in the OT, they were given only to the Jews, and never applied to all mankind. Jesus initially observed them, but later replaced them with his own universal and tolerant laws and minimalist rites. Grotius's final step is to show that there is little to no ceremonial content in the Christianity that replaced Judaism.

Grotius systematically excludes all arguments for ritual Christianity, whether they derive from references to the OT, from positing Christians as 'the new Jews,' or from Jesus' own observation of Mosaic rituals. Moreover, he does so while making it difficult for princes or ministers to persecute incorrect rituals, and as easy as possible for Jews to convert to Christianity. Idolatry toward rituals is a mistake, because rituals are inessential; yet the right attitude toward those who observe rituals is toleration.³²²

Grotius's etiology of inessential rituals is ingenious. In De veritate, II.xiii he explains that pagan religions are cruel, as shown by ancient texts, but also by recent travel and exploration reports. Judaism contains nothing unseemly or dishonest, but it is loaded with neutral adiaphora to prevent a relapse into idolatry. Turks, among others, borrowed some of these inessentials. Christianity, by contrast, is pure. Two points worth noting here is that some of the adiaphora Grotius mentions, including the Sabbath, were hotly debated among his contemporaries. His formulation and advocacy of 'pure Christianity' entailed taking a controversial stance. Secondly, Grotius's ostensibly tenuous distinction between idolatrous practices and adiaphora, neutral but integral parts of Judaism constituted solely to distract and prevent a lapse into idolatry, underscores his sensitivity to the didactic necessities and potential of religion. If he is capable and prefers to explain Jewish rituals as the harmless satisfaction of imperfect understandings, it becomes more probable that he regarded both the Christian doctrines wrapped around the ethical core, and the structure of De veritate itself, as primarily didactic in function.

³²¹ 1689 tr., V.vii.136. 1629 ed., V.167-70: "Pars vero illa legis, cujus necessitas à Christo sublata est, nihil continebat sui natura honestum: sed constabat ex rebus per se medijs, ac proinde non immutabilibus. Nam si eæ res per se aliquid haberent, cur faciendæ essent, omnibus populis non unì eas præscripsisset Deus, & ab initio statim..."

³²² 1689 tr., V.xii.148-9.

IV.4 Distinctive Christian truths

Grotius frequently invokes the testimony of pagans and non-Christians as hostile witnesses. There are several ways in which this tends to damage his case for the truth of Christianity. The deployments of non-Christian witnesses and beliefs in support of Christianity in De veritate often question Christian tenets, reduce them to non-special status, or alienate non-Christian readers by highlighting an incompatibility instead of anchoring the doctrine in reasonable common ground.

Book IV concludes with a section entitled “Ostenditur præcipua Christianæ religionis probari à sapientibus paganorum: & si quid in ea est difficile creditu, paria apud Paganos reperiri.”³²³ The premises of this section are already problematic. There are not many Christian authorities to support the first statement, namely that the wisest pagans approve of all Christian precepts.

Grotius was extremely well versed in Christian apologetics. His choices in structuring and substantiating his arguments must be interpreted in the light of this fact. Among numerous examples, De veritate is profitably compared with Lactantius, Divinarum Institutionum, Book II, and the apologetic tradition that runs through Vives, Mornay and Sebond, mentioned explicitly in the book’s opening address to Bignon.³²⁴ The opening proposition of this section, already arresting, is even more striking in this context.

But the Pagans have the less to object against Christian Religion: because all the parts thereof are of such honesty and integrity, that they convince Mens minds by their own light. In so much that there have not been wanting Men among the ³²³ 1629 ed., IV.154-5; 1689 tr., IV.xii.124-5.

³²⁴ Heering thinks that Sebond is a guise for Socinus. Heering, Grotius, 94.

Pagans also, who have here and there said every one of those things, which our Religion hath in a body all together.³²⁵

A list of cardinal Christian tenets follows. Later editions give references to the pagans who prefigured the Christian doctrines on Grotius's list, from the insignificance of rituals to the undesirability of swearing.³²⁶ The notion that every single Christian truth can be found among the pagans is neither a compelling argument to convince pagans to convert (if anything, it may have the opposite effect), nor logically necessary to Grotius's scheme. The two proofs he names as primary, namely miracles and rewards, can and in fact are demonstrated in De veritate without deriving their validity from mankind's collective religious experience. This section in Book IV remains a puzzling choice, unless one places De veritate squarely in the context of secularisation.³²⁷

IV.4.1 The Trinity

The next sub-section of IV.xii ostensibly aims to convert pagans by showing that the outlandish, creditū difficile things in Christianity are matched by similarly hard-to-believe doctrines of wise pagans. The first such item is the immortality of the soul (discussed separately below), followed by the Trinity, the possibility of combining human and divine nature, and finally the cross.

Grotius's inclusion of the Trinity among the Christian doctrines approved by the wisest pagans is not an obviously winning defense.

Thus Plato, as he learned from the Chaldeans, distinguished the Divine nature into the Father; and the mind of the Father; (which he calls also the branch of God, the Maker of the World) and the Soul or Spirit, which keeps together and preserveth all things.³²⁸

This comes as a seemingly secondary point in his attribution of the immortality of the soul to pagan philosophy; but not even those Christian apologists who traced the soul's immortality to pagans, including Marsilio Ficino (1433-99) in Theologia Platonica, went so far as to argue that

³²⁵ 1689 tr., IV.xii.124. 1629 ed., IV.154-5: "Et verò minus pagani habent, quo Christianam religionem oppugnent, quod ejus partes singulæ tantæ sunt honestatis, utsuapte luce animos quasi cōvincant, ita ut inter paganos quoque non defuerint, qui dixerint singula, quæ nostra religio habet universa..."

³²⁶ E.g. notes 1-12 on pp. 289-96 of the 1669 Amsterdam edition.

³²⁷ Somos, Secularisation.

³²⁸ 1689 tr., IV.xii.125. 1629 ed., IV.155-6: "Sic Plato à Chaldæis edoctus divinam naturam distinguit in patrem, mentem paternam, quam & rationem & Dei germen vocat, Mundi opificem, & Animam sive Spiritum quo cuncta contineantur."

Plato prefigured the Trinity in any way.³²⁹ Others, including Augustine, used exactly the uniqueness of the Trinity as a Christian doctrine to forcefully refute Plato and neo-Platonism.³³⁰ It is similarly noteworthy that Grotius puts the crucifixion in this second group of doctrines, defensible by referring to equally or more incredible pagan beliefs.³³¹

One should also note that this attribution of a clear version of the Trinity to Plato, Philo, the Rabbis, Nahmanides and the Cabbalists (repeated in V.xxi, 1627 ed. 179-80) is particularly counterproductive in a proof of the truth of Christianity when it is coupled with the argument that the Trinity cannot be derived from reason, and must be discovered through, believed due to, and otherwise derived solely from, revelation. Grotius's adoption of this notion from Junius, and his resistance to friends' and enemies' suggestion that he changes his position, is well known.³³² What has not, to my knowledge, been noted before is that grounding the Trinity exclusively in revelation, while attributing the same doctrine to Plato and Jews, undercuts the exclusivity and eminence of both Christian and Judeo-Christian revelation, and renders the Trinity, impossible to prove from reason, inaccessible to those who have not received the same revelation. In other words, this makes the Trinity both inaccessible to reason and to anyone without direct revelation, and not unique to Christianity.

IV.4.2 Jesus Christ

Grotius's intention in writing De veritate has been the subject of considerable debate. Is it a conciliatory gesture toward orthodox Calvinism or a confession of crypto-Socinianism? Is it addressed primarily to Christians, in order to foster unity, or should the reader take seriously Grotius's assertion that his way of reclassifying and verifying Christian doctrine can help convert non-Christians to the true faith? Is there a difference between the seriousness, urgency, and expectation of success in his addresses to Jews, Muslims, pagans and Christians?

Without claiming to settle these debates, the language and organisation of De veritate suggests that Grotius was serious about addressing the Jews. However, in the course of crafting and compiling various reasons why they should accept Jesus as the Messiah, Grotius created a Jesus that a broad range of Christians would have found hard to recognise as their own.

³²⁹ Or if Ficino does this, I have not found it. Grotius also asserts that Cabalists have the same view of Trinity: 1629 ed., V.208; 1689 tr., V.xxi.165.

³³⁰ Augustine, On the City of God, x.

³³¹ The significance of the cross was a much-debated issue. To cite one example, Robert Parker (1569-1614) had to flee after publishing A scholasticall Discourse against symbolizing with Antichrist in ceremonies, especially in the Signe of the Crosse in 1607, in which he strongly objects to the symbol. He became minister to the separatists in Holland.

³³² E.g. Heering, Grotius, 209-12. Nellen, "Minimal," 40.

De veritate, II.vi contains several disingenuous or suspect points. Grotius argues that Jesus must have worked real miracles, inexplicable by nature or the devil's assistance, because if that were not the case, these miracles would have been questioned by Christianity's enemies. The appeal to an apophatically universal consent is already suspicious; but the real problem is that De veritate details numerous criticisms against Christianity on exactly this score. V.ii, for instance, counters those Jews who attribute Jesus' miracles to the devil's help – the precise charge that has not, according to II.vi, ever been made.³³³

Grotius asserts that all accusations against Jesus for being non-Jewish, or transgressing Mosaic laws, are false. Jesus observed all Jewish laws and rituals before his resurrection.³³⁴ Nor does the spate of accusations against him mean that Jesus was not an observant and orthodox Jew. Micah, Elijah and Jeremiah were similarly accused, and later justified.³³⁵ Not even his claim to be the Messiah was unprecedented.³³⁶

IV.4.2.1 Son of God, Son of Man

Grotius points out that the doctrine that Jesus was the son of God is not original to Christianity, either. Plato had earlier, and Mohammed later, made the same point about someone.³³⁷ Julian attributed a dual, divine and human, nature to Aesclepius.³³⁸

IV.4.2.2 Death, Resurrection, and Ascension

Many contemporary Christians and thinkers, including Hobbes, insisted that the historical fact of Jesus' resurrection must be central to the truth and appeal of Christianity. As explained elsewhere, for instance in Section II.3 on miracles above, Grotius himself put considerable stock in this doctrine. The argument of II.vii, namely that Christ's resurrection cannot be refuted on grounds of impossibility because reports of resurrection from Plato, Heraclides, Herodotus and Plutarch show that wise men regarded it possible,³³⁹ cuts against the unique appeal and truth of Christianity, which is the ostensible demonstrandum of De veritate.

In later editions Grotius added the testimony of Rabbi Bechai to those who witnessed Christ's resurrection. The Judæorum magister Bechai mentioned in De veritate is probably Bahye ben Asher ibn Halawa (mid-13th cent. – 1340), an anti-Christian polemicist noted for ³³³ See Section IV.ii above.

³³⁴ 1629 ed., V.166; 1689 tr., V.vii.135.

³³⁵ 1629 ed., V.206; 1689 tr., V.xx.164.

³³⁶ 1629 ed., V.194; 1689 tr., V.xvii.156.

³³⁷ 1629 ed., VI.226; 1689 tr., VI.ix.179-80. [1669: 395].

³³⁸ 1629 ed., IV.156; 1689 tr., IV.125.

³³⁹ Repeated in II.viii, and II.xii.

introducing the Kabbalah into Torah study, and for the influential Kad ha-Kemah, a series of homilies designed to instruct in everyday ethics. Kad ha-Kemah 49.1 may be the source of Grotius's intriguing enlistment of a Rabbinic authority for Christ's resurrection. If so, it is a daring co-optation, but in keeping with the pattern in the rest of De veritate, where Grotius goes beyond many contemporary Christians' comfort zone in order to connect with Jewish readers.

Although the reference to ben Asher appears only in later editions, the first edition already states that the authors of the OT and the Talmud believe the credible witnesses to Elisha's ascent to Heaven; and Jews should therefore accept the same report of Christ.³⁴⁰ Likewise, already in the 1627 first edition, Grotius invokes the prophecy of Nehumias, magister Hebræus who lived 50 years or so before Christ, that the Messiah will come within 50 years.³⁴¹ Grotius's inclusion of Rabbi Bechai as an actual rabbi who, as he thought, accepted Christ's resurrection, is the continuation of a pre-existing systematic inquiry into commonalities.

This is not to say that while Grotius went to great lengths to uncover and foreground these commonalities, he side-stepped or ignored all differences. A short section in Book V states his unequivocal rejection of the alleged Jewish accusation that Jesus obtained his miracle-working powers by stealing from the Temple a secret name, protected by lions for over a thousand years.³⁴² Surprisingly, Leclerc did not comment on this section at all, known by that point as a separate chapter (V.iv) entitled Aut vi vocum, referring to earlier section headings on why the Jews should accept Christ's miracles, and not attribute them to devils or power words.³⁴³

Grotius is referring here to the Shem ha-Mephorash, anciently used by the Tannaim and later by Kabbalists for the Tetragrammaton. The story of Jesus stealing it from the Temple is likely to come from Sefer Toledot Yeshu, a popular medieval anti-Christian text. Luther quoted it in his quite rabid 1543 Vom Schem Hamphoras und vom Geschlecht Christi, using a Strassburg translation. Grotius could have also known about this book from Ramón Martí's 1280 Pugio Fidei, or from Jüdischer Abgestreifter Schlangenbalg (1614) by Samuel Friedrich Brenz.³⁴⁴

³⁴⁰ 1627 ed., 135-6.

³⁴¹ 1627 ed., 160-1. Also see 1627 ed., 175, "Melius antiqui Hebræorum magistri fatebantur hæc de Messia dici..." and 178, "Addendum hic..."

³⁴² 1627 ed., 137-8, 1689 tr. 131.

³⁴³ 1734 ed., V.iv.227-8.

³⁴⁴ On Scaliger's and his students' knowledge and use of the Pugio, including in De veritate, see Somos, Secularisation, 325-7. The Houghton Library copy of Brenz's book claims to be printed in Augsburg, not Nuremberg, as most bibliographical sources have it.

Grotius refutes the Toledot Yeshu story with the argument that lions, though surely the most noteworthy sight, are not mentioned in descriptions of the Temple by Josephus, or the Books of Kings and Chronicles, or any Roman writer. The first odd thing is that this is Grotius's entire treatment of the thesis that Christ wrought miracles with the power of words. The New Testament is full of such cases. Secondly, one should note that the Kings and Chronicles contain well-known references to lions in Solomon's Temple, famously in 2 Chr. 9:19. An elementary, non-specialist familiarity with the OT, or popular knowledge of the depictions of the Temple, were sufficient to detect the error of Grotius's argument.³⁴⁵

IV.4.3 Free will

Grotius's strong version of free will may be the only unproblematic and unquestioned Christian doctrine in De veritate.³⁴⁶ Man is born with an intrinsic sense of free will. It is the reason why astrology is wrong, and God is not responsible for evil.

I do not here speak of such effects as follow from a natural necessity of causes, but of those that proceed from the will of Man, which of it self hath such liberty and freedom, that no necessity or violence can be impressed upon it from without. For if the consent of the will did necessarily follow any outward impression, then the power in our Soul, which we may perceive it hath to consult, deliberate and chuse, would be given in vain. Also the equity of all Laws, of all rewards and punishments would be taken away, seeing there can be neither fault nor merit in that which is altogether necessary and inevitable.³⁴⁷

While natural forces can affect will-formation, the Christian and contemplative man can learn to dissociate from nature and achieve self-mastery. Grotius's linking of Christianity and Stoicism is well discussed in recent literature.³⁴⁸ The point to note here is that the Christian free will doctrine Grotius offers is developed legally and philosophically, rather than on specifically Christian foundations. It needs little Christianity to work.

³⁴⁵ See for instance Somos, Secularisation, 413-4 for the same technique in De iure praedae.

³⁴⁶ 1689 tr., IV.xi.122.

³⁴⁷ 1689 Simon Patrick tr., IV.xi.122. See also the next paragraph. In 1629 ed., 152: 'Non de illis loquor effectibus, qui ex naturali necessitate causarum sequuntur, sed de his, qui ab humana procedunt voluntate...'

³⁴⁸ See e.g. eds. Hans Blom and Laurens Winkel, Grotius and the Stoa, Grotiana n.s. 22/23 (2001-2002), reissued (Assen, 2004).

IV.4.4 Immortality and last judgment

As mentioned above, Grotius's logical argument for the immortality of the soul and the last judgment is fallacious. Moreover, in De veritate, I.xii he attributes the same two beliefs to several pagan groups. Just as he courted controversy by ascribing the notion of the Trinity to Plato, Grotius does the same with the immortality of the soul (I.xxiv).

IV.4.5 Doctrinal omissions

The absence of the Trinity from the list of core doctrines Grotius set out to prove provoked fierce criticism at least until the nineteenth century.³⁴⁹ Although Grotius refers to the idea of a Prime Mover briefly (in I.xxii), he does not include it among the proofs of God's existence at the beginning of De veritate.

When he elaborates in II.vii that God would not allow innocent men to suffer or be misled, Grotius is effectively denying tenets that hinge on the notion of trials and tribulations. This notion is well supported in the NT, and most Christian denominations subscribed to a variety. Grotius's treatment of evil spirits as real and effective (e.g. in II.vi), however, precludes the doctrine that they are all the products of ignorance, idolatry, or trials and tribulations.

This is also the place to note the peculiarity of De veritate, II.xvii, where Grotius refutes Christianity's critics who emphasise the disagreements and controversies among Christian factions. A diversity of opinion about matters of secondary importance is natural, and inevitably appears in all areas of human knowledge; but certain basic principles are evident and indisputable without losing credibility. Grotius ends his passionate plea to accept these principles, attested by all Christians, the same way everyone admits the whiteness of snow:

For in the opinion of any indifferent Judge, that must needs be reputed the true doctrine of Christ, which so many have successively acknowledged and professed; like as we are perswaded that was the doctrine of Socrates which we read in Plato and Xenophon; as also that of Zeno the Philosopher, which we find held by the Stoicks.³⁵⁰

As mentioned before, there were no key doctrines left unquestioned in this book. De veritate and other works of Christian minimalism explicitly set out to find the sustainable core, and ³⁴⁹ For some, see the secondary literature cited in Section IV.1 above. Similar cases of Grotius's deliberate and politically strategic omissions of specific doctrines from biblical exegeses in De iure praedae are given in Somos, Secularisation, 416-22.

³⁵⁰ 1675 ed., II.xvii, 180: "Nam quod hi omnes ut Christi dogma agnoscunt, id omnino pro tali habendum est ab æquo rerum iudice: sicut Platoni, Xenophonti, aliisque Socratis, Stoicorum scholæ de his quæ Zeno tradidit."

generate consensus around it. Note, however, that even if De veritate did not fail to postulate such a doctrinal core of Christianity, Grotius's equation of the epistemic reliability that could be attributed to such a minimalist core by an equitable judge with the reliability that the same judge would attribute to Socrates or Zeno, based on their followers' evidence, would still debase the claim of Christianity to special truth.

IV.5 Proofs from providential history

IV.5.1 The Bible's textual integrity

Grotius opens De veritate, Book III with the statement that the eponymous authors of biblical books did in fact write them, and this plain and uncomplicated fact is proved by the absence of any controversy by Christians, Jews or pagans on this matter.³⁵¹ This was one of the, if not the, most disputed issues in the history of biblical exegesis, in which the seventeenth century was not the calmest. It is difficult to avoid the impression that Grotius's unqualified oversimplification and mis-statement are intentional. In fact, Grotius later modifies this statement by adding that some texts, including Revelation, Hebrews, and the second epistle of Peter, have only been recently accepted; but they contain nothing that is not attested in other books. Elsewhere, for instance in Book V, he himself calls attention to the broad and contested range of interpretations in existence.³⁵²

The implausible overstatement regarding the Bible's undisputed textual integrity is followed by a move, still in Book III, that has a didactic secularising effect whether or not one accepts the seriousness of this opening statement. Denying disagreement among the biblical books, Grotius states that they "do most manifestly and apparently agree about such things as concern any weighty point of doctrine or history,"³⁵³ and that such consent cannot be found outside Christianity. Small discrepancies do not undermine but strengthen the case for the Bible's veracity, because such discrepancies are natural and prove that there was no conspiracy among the authors. If readers unreasonably considered small discrepancies unacceptable, then all books, especially histories, would have to be discarded. Polybius, Halicarnassus, Livy and Plutarch write true histories, even if they disagree on small details.³⁵⁴

Firstly, subjecting the Bible to the same sort of textual criticism as non-religious texts was still a highly controversial manoeuvre in the seventeenth century. It was common, for instance, to consider God as the author of the Bible, and the men reported in the Bible as ³⁵¹ 1629 ed., III.101-3.

³⁵² 1629 ed. III.197; 1689 tr. V.xviii.157.

³⁵³ 1689 tr., III.xiii.97. 1629 ed., III.119: "quod in rebus, quæ aliquod dogmatis, aut historiæ momentum in se habent, manifestissima est ubique consensio..."

³⁵⁴ 1629 ed., III.120.

various sections' authors as hardly more than divinely inspired amanuenses. Discrepancies were often explained as mysteries, limitations of human language and understanding, figurative or allegorical expressions, prophecies still unfulfilled, and so forth. There was a range of more pious alternatives to attributing them to human errors akin to contradictions within and between historical texts.³⁵⁵ Secondly, the acknowledgement of even small discrepancies is not uncontroversial in De veritate's historical context. Thirdly, Grotius sets the same standards for the Bible's integrity as for histories.³⁵⁶ Fourthly, just a few pages later Grotius directly contradicts his statement that the same consent cannot be found outside Christianity, when he reformulates the same proofs of the NT's veracity for the OT. According to Grotius, one proof of the OT's textual integrity is that the dispersion of the Jews did not produce rival versions.³⁵⁷ The fifth thing worth noting here is the ingenious way in which Grotius removes the disputed parts of the Bible from Christianity's core doctrines, and positions only the universally accepted parts left – if any – as really important.

Next, Grotius builds one of the most remarkable sections in De veritate to prove the Bible's authenticity. The section is difficult to summarise adequately, but centers on the argument that the integrity of the biblical text is shown by its survival of various challenges, including the translation of the text into many languages, and the absence of an authority figure who could have imposed a text other than the one that truthfully reflected the reported events. The biblical doctrines concerning God are true, because the God described therein would not have allowed thousands of men, earnestly desiring salvation, to be misled into error.³⁵⁸ On the one hand, this is a blatant logical fallacy. On the other, Grotius gives actual counterexamples of such false beliefs in his accounts of paganism and Islam, both of them ³⁵⁵ This is an important and influential argument. Bochart makes the same point in Phaleg II (1646), referencing Dubiorum Evangelicorum (1631-39), written by Friedrich Spanheim (1600-49) in Geneva before he became professor of theology at Leiden in 1642. Walton cites Bochart on this point in Biblia sacra polyglotta (London, 1657) – discussed in further detail in chapter V on Selden below – in Prolegomena, IV.36, §§2-3. The interesting fact that despite its priority and influence the De veritate formulation of this principle is not mentioned in these texts may confirm that it was, and was seen as, framing this principle to secularising effect. The later interpretation of this break is similarly informative: in Origines sacrae (1662) Stillingfleet used Bochart to show that pagan wisdom was corrupted biblical truth, but he could not have based the same point on either Scaliger or Selden. In sum, the Protestant-Catholic divide, which shapes current scholarly literature on sacred geographies should be expanded with a secularising category. Catherine Delano Smith, "Maps in Bibles in the 16th Century," The Map Collector 39 (1987), 2-14. C.D.S. and E.M. Ingram, Maps in Bibles (Droz, 1991). Shalev, Sacred Words.

³⁵⁶ Somos, Secularisation, ch. II and passim, on the historicisation of the Bible; and 414-6 for the secularising effect of the same technique in De iure praedae. Another case in De veritate is the Sabbath, which Grotius fully historicises in order to refute its binding ceremonial character. 1689 tr., V.x.145-6.

³⁵⁷ 1629 ed., 129-31. For related arguments by contemporaries see Somos, "Mare Clausum, Leviathan, and Oceana: Bible Criticism, Secularisation and Imperialism in Seventeenth-Century English Political and Legal Thought," in eds. C.L. Crouch and J. Stökl, In the Name of God: The Bible in the Colonial Discourse of Empire (Brill, 2014), 85-132, Section II.

³⁵⁸ 1629 ed., III.127.

widespread belief systems at one time or another, despite the combination of God's benevolence and these religions' error.

IV.5.2 The spread of Christianity

There are two perhaps unexpected ways in which Grotius uses the survival and spread of Christianity to prove its truth content. First, Christianity's historical survival in the face of adversity is unparalleled evidence of its truth, according to Grotius, but only if one regards it as the perfection of the Jewish religion – which is older.³⁵⁹ Secondly, Grotius presents the spreading of Christianity as one of the miraculous signs of its truth.

... if God have any care of humane affairs, this doctrine cannot but be believed to be Divine. It was very agreeable to Divine Providence, to make that which was best, to be of the greatest and largest extent. ... And certainly there is no other Religion comparable hereunto for ample and large extent.³⁶⁰

Grotius's conclusion to this section is that while Islam commands large territories, all of its countries contain Christians as well; but the opposite is not true.

Grotius also appeals to the spread of Christianity as proof that Jesus is really the Messiah foretold in Jewish prophecies, unlike others who made the same claim, but left no followers behind. Moreover, his followers converted more people, and whole states, replacing other faiths.

Before Jesus his coming almost the whole World was over-spread with false Worships and Religions: which afterward by little and little began to vanish away, and not only single persons, but both People and Kings were converted unto the worship and service of one God.³⁶¹

The self-subversion of Grotius's argument for Christianity's truth based on its territorial, demographic and political expansion, and on its conversion of states and individuals at the ³⁵⁹ 1629 ed., I.xiii.

³⁶⁰ 1689 tr., II.xxi.71-2. 1629 ed., 88-90: "non possit hoc dogma non divinum credi. Conveniebat divinæ providentiæ id efficere, ut, quod optimum esset, pateret quam latissime. (...) Quæ est religio, quæ cum tam lata possessione possit contendere?" Note how Patrick's translation turned the question into a statement. See also 1629 ed., 99; 1675 ed., II.xviii. 183-4.

³⁶¹ 1689 tr., V.xvii.155-7. The passage cited is on 156-7.

expense of other religions, is set up in perfect detail, as Grotius explains the mirroring set of the same metrics of success as signs of unholy aggression and false beliefs in Islam.

A second reason why Grotius's contrast between the spread of Christianity and the expansion of Islam is indicative of didactic secularisation is that the self-contradiction we find in his discussion of the former is mirrored in the latter. As we saw, Grotius gives conflicting proofs of the truth of Christianity, as peaceful and simple until Constantine on the one hand, and increasingly corrupt and victorious afterwards, on the other; with both initial pacifism and its unrivalled later worldly expansion meant to prove its truth. Similarly, in De veritate, VI.vii. he describes Islam as a religion that is a mere accessory to war. Therefore its conquests condemn, not justify, its religious truth. Immediately, Grotius inverts the argument: Islam's later defeats show the religion's inconstancy. The passage is worth citing at length.

There is nothing that is liable to such uncertain alterations, nothing that may be common both to good and bad; which can be a certain note of true Religion: much less can their Arms, which are so unjust, that oftentimes they fall upon people, that do not any way molest or offend them, nor are known to them by any injury; in so much that all the pretence they have for their Arms, is only Religion; which is most irreligious.

For there is no true worship of God, but what proceeds from a willing mind. And the will is to be wrought upon by good instruction and gentle perswasion, but not by threats or violence. He that is compelled to believe, doth not believe at all, but plays the Hypocrite, and feigns himself to believe, that he may escape and avoid some danger or punishment. And he that by threats or sense of punishment, will force another Man's assent, shews by that very proceeding, that he distrusts his arguments. Again, they themselves destroy this very pretence of Religion; in that they suffer any people that live under their Dominion, to use what Religion they please: yea, and sometimes they will openly acknowledge, that Christians may be saved by their own Law.³⁶²

It is hard not to hear Grotius's criticism of Counter-Remonstrants and a sense of his own predicament in this passage. (Moreover, the concluding sentence suggests that even these oppressive Muslims have a degree of tolerance and understanding.) It is also one more statement that warrants paying attention to the immediate historical and personal context of ³⁶² 1689 tr., VI.vii.177-8. 1627 ed., VI.193-4.

De veritate's composition. The simple facts of the Remonstrants' persecution and Grotius's imprisonment suggest that in addition to Grotius's genuine point about Islam, this passage is also a thinly veiled attack on the Gomarists.³⁶³ Importantly, alongside this secularising twist, Grotius's condemnation in De veritate of proselytism by violence and conquest, the hard imperialisms of Christianity and Islam, also serves as a theological and legal justification of the legal and administrative practices that often characterised Dutch soft imperialism until the 1660s, the end of the period examined in this Thesis.³⁶⁴

IV.5.3 The early Church and the Bible

Placing the New Testament in an historicising context, Grotius showed that the Apostles believed that the Second Coming was imminent.³⁶⁵ Heering explains a contemporary inference.

Sarrau wondered if this did not strip the Scriptures of all their authority; for if the apostles had really believed this they would have been the victims of a delusion, and would immediately lose all their authority.³⁶⁶

One can perhaps distinguish three reasons for this instant loss of authority. One is that the Apostles were mistaken. In the rest of this paragraph in II.vii, Grotius ties the correctness, and evidential value, of the Apostles' belief closely to the erroneous assumption of an imminent Second Coming. In addition, one also wonders whether Christianity, thus historicised, meets Grotius's two criteria of a good religion. What use is the ethical guidance of Christianity for everyday life if the religion's establishment was predicated on the imminent end of everyday life? And what does it mean if those who first transmitted the promise of reward, the other hallmark of a good religion, were completely mistaken about the reward's nature and delivery? A third reason may be suggested in the next part of Grotius's argument.

³⁶³ Klein points to the same contradictions in the text, and reads them as Grotius's reproach of Christianity in general for falling behind Islam in tolerance. I agree that there are self-contradictions, but I think they hide narrower criticisms of Counter-Remonstrants. Neither am I convinced by Klein that Grotius seriously posited Islam as a lesson in toleration for Christians. Klein, "Hugo Grotius's Position," at 157-8. Conversely, when Klein intriguingly conjectures that Grotius deliberately identified and foregrounded Socinian-Muslim commonalities and doctrinal approximations, I see Grotius use these commonalities to subvert his prima facie argument for the reasonableness of Christianity not in order to move closer to Socinianism, but in pursuit of his irenic, ecumenist, and didactic objective.

³⁶⁴ E.g. Jack P. Greene, "The Cultural Dimensions of Political Transfers: An Aspect of European Occupation of the Americas," Early Modern American Studies 6:1 (2008), 1-27, esp. 5-6, 9-11.

³⁶⁵ E.g. 1629 ed., II.vii. On the pervasive secularising effect of his historicisation of the OT see Dmitri Levitin, "From Sacred History to the History of Religion: Paganism, Judaism, and Christianity in European Historiography from Reformation to 'Enlightenment'," The Historical Journal 55:4 (2012), 1117-60, at 1129.

³⁶⁶ Heering, Grotius, 215, with references and summary of their 1640-1 exchange.

Moreover all Religions, and Christianity more than any other, forbids lying in bearing false witness, especially in divine things.³⁶⁷

In the context, it is hard to resist the inference that either the Apostles completely misunderstood Jesus, or Jesus deceived them about the imminence of his return. Neither tine on this Morton's fork bodes well for the truth of Christianity.

Circling back to section V.1 above on the Bible's textual integrity, one should note Grotius's familiarity with arguments that the early Christians corrupted the text, partly by mistake, partly with interpolations that matched early prophecies to later events, to make the latter seem like a fulfilment.³⁶⁸

IV.6 Aspects of reception

Grotius gave diverse accounts of the ambition of De veritate. His brother Willem asked Gerard Vossius in a letter of 14 June, 1619 to send Grotius books to support his writing project against atheists, Jews, heathens and Muslims, as well as the internal enemies of the church. In a 15 December, 1619 letter to Vossius, Grotius mentioned unbelievers and Jews as the target audience of his intended short book.³⁶⁹ When Willem predicted that Grotius will be severely censured for not proving the Trinity or the divinity of Christ, Grotius replied on 12 April, 1620 that his intended audience is not Christians, but impij, ethnici, iudaei, mahometistae.³⁷⁰ The Preface reiterates these target audiences, and adds Dutch seafarers in particular. De veritate, Grotius explains, is meant to help the Dutch, who excel other nations in navigation, spread Christianity, and also resist the temptations of converting to paganism, Islam, or Judaism.

Both a close reading and the history of its reception show that De veritate, while not a secular or atheistic text, had a profoundly secularising impact. Its ostensible minimalism and its self-contradictions are both reasons for De veritate's enormous eighteenth-century success.³⁷¹ Blom points out Grotius's engagement with Vorstius and Socinianism in both Ordinum pietas and De satisfactione, and that De veritate revives this engagement by incorporating Socinian exegeses.³⁷² This challenges the hypothesis that Grotius used Vorstius's anonymous edition

³⁶⁷ 1689 tr., II.vii.48.

³⁶⁸ H.J. De Jonge, "Joseph Scaliger's Historical Criticism of the New Testament," Novum Testamentum 38 (1996), 176-93.

³⁶⁹ References in Heering, Grotius, 9.

³⁷⁰ Cited on Heering, Grotius, 73. Note that my concern here is Grotius's original intention, not the later missionary uses of his work.

³⁷¹ Champion, "'Socinianism.'"

³⁷² Hans Blom, "Grotius and Socinianism," in eds. Martin Mulrow and Jan Rohls, Socinianism and Arminianism: Antitrinitarians, Calvinists and Cultural Exchange in Seventeenth-Century Europe (Brill, 2005), 121-47, at 124-5.

unwittingly. Furthermore, both his brother Willem and Vossius pointed out resemblances to Socinus as early as 1620, and the point turned into public accusation already before the 1629 edition.³⁷³

It is certainly noteworthy that many scholars detected a causal link between early modern Socinianism and the retrenchment of Christianity from disciplines outside theology. Having noted the relevance of this debate to secularisation, I leave the question of Socinianism and De veritate to others and summarise the above findings, based almost exclusively on an internal analysis of De veritate.

IV.7 Conclusion: Christianity according to De Veritate

Mirum autem non est, umbras destinati operis auferri opere impleto.
Grotius, Sensus librorum sex, quos pro veritate Religionis Christianæ (1627), 158

IV.7.1 Summary of findings

Grotius ostensibly presented certain tenets as the minimalist core of Christianity that commanded universal consensus. He did not positively specify which tenets these were.³⁷⁴ Elsewhere he acknowledged that Christian sects were numerous and disagreed viciously;³⁷⁵ and that such a consensus was impossible to begin with.³⁷⁶ Moreover, Christians have disputed every doctrine from the start.³⁷⁷ Each doctrine that Grotius implied was necessary and universal was challenged in his lifetime, together with his selection,³⁷⁸ and his method.³⁷⁹ Even compared to other secularising essays in irenicism and minimalism, De veritate stands out as unusual. The fact that contemporary condemnations (and rewritings) of De veritate came ecumenically from Catholics, Remonstrants, strict Calvinists, Anglicans, and others, corroborates its uniqueness.³⁸⁰

Grotius's separation between reason and revelation, which underlies his division of doctrines, does not work. Grotius systematically refused to address the Trinity, the nature of ³⁷³ Heering, Grotius, 200-2.

³⁷⁴ Heering, Grotius, 70.

³⁷⁵ 1629 ed., 111-2.

³⁷⁶ Nellen, "Minimal," an excellent point on 30, referring to De iure belli ac pacis, II.20.50.2.

³⁷⁷ 1629 ed., VI.213-5. 1689 tr., VI.170.

³⁷⁸ Heering, Grotius, 200.

³⁷⁹ Heering, Grotius, 208-9: too general an account of God. See Heering, Grotius, 210, for Shoochius's criticism.

³⁸⁰ Major criticisms from Episcopius, Vossius, Schoockius, and Sarrau are referred to above. Maresius, Rivet, and others in Heering, Grotius, chapter 7. On competing rewritings and adaptations see e.g. Heering, Grotius, 236-8. Idem, 73: Grotius is unique among Christian apologists in not proving the truth of Christian doctrines.

Christ, correct rites, and so forth. These he claimed – but only in letters to friends – to leave to revelation, intending to lead men to faith by using reason to prove the veracity of Scripture and the historicity of Christ. At the same time, Grotius showed that by using reason, one found that all the revealed truths of Christianity were not unique.

The appeal to self-interest throughout De veritate makes perfect sense if we read the Conclusion as the end of the lesson that Grotius in his correspondence explained De veritate to be. Convinced, as far as possible, of the factual truth and profitability of Christianity, the reader learns to love and trust Christ and the Christian community through an unspecified emotional mechanism, set in motion by the appeal to the reader's power of reasoning, self-interest, free will, and autonomy. The rhetorical trajectory that runs from de-emphasising accepted authority with a respectful appeal to individual reason, through the thorough and careful subversion of reasonable proofs of Christian doctrines, to the eventual persuasion about faith's importance and reason's severe limits, also tallies with Grotius's repeated warning to the reader that different demonstranda call for different methods.³⁸¹ If this is the, or one, explanation for De veritate's conspicuous and systematic self-contradictions, then the striking feature of De veritate becomes the even starker minimalism of Christianity's doctrinal content. If miracles and rewards lead one to believe in Christ, and reasonable arguments concerning witnessed and transmitted miracles and the divinity and resurrection of Christ are shown to have been a didactic tool, there is not much left beyond irrational hope.³⁸²

IV.7.2 Thesis 1: Secularising legalism

As mentioned, Grotius was keenly conscious of the need to match style to content. The interesting thing is that while his source is Aristotle, he also attributes this rhetorical insight to Moses.³⁸³ Several arguments and compositional features have been noticed by other scholars, and in this chapter, that bring out the striking fact that De veritate follows the genre characteristics of a legal treatise. On the one hand, this is readily understandable, given Grotius's training, and his trust in legal methods of presenting and evaluating evidence, and positing and balancing arguments, in front of De veritate's intended broad and diverse audience. Moreover, to some extent he was working on De veritate and De iure belli ac pacis in ³⁸¹ Evrigenis, Images is an excellent study of a comparable, though more sophisticated, rhetorical strategy in Hobbes's Leviathan.

³⁸² Despite a few generalisations and overstatements, Hiram Haydn's thesis in The Counter-Renaissance (New York, 1950), namely that a fideism skeptical of humanism and reason was the main intellectual movement that nourished both the Reformation and 'the scientific revolution,' remains valuable, especially as it situates the repeal of all universal laws, including the divine, in this movement, and discusses Machiavelli as one of the architects of this anti-humanist move.

³⁸³ 1629 ed., I.xiv. Also see 1689 tr., I.xv.25-6.

parallel.³⁸⁴ On the other hand, the consequent reductionism, use of analogies, balancing claims to come to a reasonable verdict rather than accommodating claims that seem contrary to reason, the prioritisation of authorities, the minimalisation of potentially conflicting definitions,³⁸⁵ and other legalistic features of De veritate, are ill-suited to proving the truth of any religion. The rhetorical and argumentative techniques that are available in a theological or mystical treatise to, for instance, reconcile reasonable with revelation-based doctrines, are unavailable in a legal treatise. The numerous ways in which Grotius's reliance on the device of testimonies subverts his claim to prove the truth of Christianity comprise one such case; the reluctance to offer a treatment of the Trinity, despite friends' and enemies' warnings, may be another.

Heering is among those who rightly draw attention to the peculiarity of De veritate within the apologetic genre as primarily a legal treatise, in method, source selection, argumentation, and arrangement.³⁸⁶ This is a crucial point, and one can expand it by noting Grotius's examination of witnesses' potential conflicts of interest, his systematic invocation of hostile witnesses,³⁸⁷ as well as the assumption that the agreement of pagans, Jews, and Muslims on aspects of Christianity constitute sufficient proof. This assumption holds up in forensic reasoning and not otherwise, especially when the witnesses are also systematically shown to be unreliable in general and in the particulars of their own creed. The net result, therefore, is a strong refutation of opponents of Christianity, but a weak or even self-contradictory verification of Christianity.

No less striking is the fact that when Grotius explains how the true religion was extended from the Jews to all mankind, he consistently employs legal formulations. One instance is the legal idiom with which Grotius shows Christ abrogating the Mosaic law, and expressing his sovereignty after the Resurrection by granting immunity and making laws in a way he was previously unable to. Both the abrogation of Mosaic law, and the expansion of the true faith to cover the whole of humanity, are likened to a sovereign abolishing municipal statutes for the sake of uniform government.³⁸⁸ The historicisation of the Bible that Grotius learned from Scaliger, among others, is augmented by the technical uses of history in legal reasoning. One of such cases in De veritate concerns the Sabbath. Grotius explains that it is not binding, but a particular historical custom limited to the OT. The weak and flexible standing of the laws of the Sabbath is further attested by OT passages showing it yield to other imperatives, from ³⁸⁴ Heering, Grotius, 36.

³⁸⁵ See Heering, Grotius, 71, references to relevant passages in other Grotius works.

³⁸⁶ Heering, Grotius, 62, 71, 242, passim.

³⁸⁷ II.13.48, II.16, II.22.70-1, for Messiah.

³⁸⁸ 1629 ed., V.167-8, 171.

circumcision to the siege of Jericho. Generalising from this law, Grotius explains that none of the ordinances instituted in memory of the Exodus (including the outward circumcision, which trumped the Sabbath) are binding.³⁸⁹ The same this-worldly legalism informs Grotius's reconstruction of the Apostles' misunderstanding of Jesus' promise as referring to an imminent Second Coming, a view for which Grotius was heavily criticised by contemporaries. Passages like

Moreover, vain is that perswasion which they conceive of GOD, that he is good, and therefore will not punish this offence; because they so to do, were contrary to his goodness. For mercy or clemency, that it may be just, hath its bounds and limits: and where wickedness abounds beyond measure, there justice doth as it were necessarily require the infliction of punishment.³⁹⁰ exemplify other legalisms, deployed to make legal sense of Christian doctrines like God's justice, even if they come at the cost of reasoning more like a lawyer than a Christian. Another instance is Grotius's defense of free will, following his refutation of astronomy. And as we saw in section 4.3 above, it is the primarily legal, not the Christian, definition of intention that underpins the right understanding of free will.

The legal framework sharpens our focus on the question: what is the significance of all these self-contradictions? What is the reason for this method? One obvious, but ultimately unconvincing, reason is that the original version was written while Grotius was in custody. Although this is certainly important, it is an insufficient explanation of the particular features described here. Moreover, one should not be quick to reduce the text to the most simplistic reconstruction of its context, especially given the history of later editions, and Grotius's opportunities to make emendations. In the preface to Bignon, Grotius contrasts his corporal captivity with his mental freedom to use Jewish and Christian sources uti voluisse meo qualicunque judicio, & animo dare, negatam, cum id scriberem, corpori libertatem.³⁹¹ A more careful explanation is needed.

³⁸⁹ 1689 tr. V.x.145-6. 1629 ed., 182: "Iam vero, quæ in memoriam exitus ab Ægypto instituta sunt, non esse talia, ut nunquam cessare debeant, supra jam ostendimus ex promisso majorum multo beneficiorum." Outward circumcision superseded: V.xi.

³⁹⁰ 1689 tr., IV.iii.111. 1629 ed., IV.138: "Stulta autem est persuasio, qua fingunt, Deum bonum id non vindicaturum, quia id à bonitate alienum esset. Nam clementia, ut justa sit, suos habet limites, & ubi scelera modum excedunt, pœnam justitia ex se quasi necessario producit."

³⁹¹ De veritate, 2.

IV.7.3 Thesis 2: Didactic secularisation

An intriguing alternative explanation for the numerous, systematic, and strategic self-contradictions in De veritate is Jane Newman's suggestion that Grotius did not seek to establish a new orthodoxy or a minimalist consensus on reason, but on the authority of the early church, and "local receptions of Scripture in various countries and tongues." His intention was to re-establish what Newman calls "unity-in-diversity" as Christianity's proper foundation.³⁹² One could add to her supporting citations Grotius's argument that even though localised natural causes can affect will-formation, Christianity continued for 16 centuries under different constellations.³⁹³

One reason to not be satisfied with this explanation is that even later, rewritten and mature versions of De veritate carry the marks of their origin as a didactic poem. The legalistic genre was superimposed without obliterating this foundation. There is no tension between the legalistic and the didactic framework; we saw, for instance, that Grotius thought that Moses composed in the same way. So did God: OT laws were, Grotius points out often, a didactic device.³⁹⁴ Nonetheless, the didactic structure built into De veritate can be divorced and retraced independently from the work's legalistic form.

Grotius's appeal to all men's reason is the first step of his strategy. This allows him to claim to build on common ground, as well as to fiercely criticise religious doctrines in paganism, Islam, Judaism, and in Christianity, that do not fit the minimalist thrust of his argument, namely the reduction of strife-causing doctrinal commitments. On this common ground, however, following his call for a shared epistemic space, he proceeds to perform a series of moves that demolish the power of human reason to prove Christianity. Designating miracles as one hallmark of a true religion, consistently placing tremendous burdens of proof on them, and consistently subverting the credibility of biblical miracles, comprise one of these moves.³⁹⁵ Others are detailed above.

³⁹² J.O. Newman, "'Race,' Religion, and the Law: Rhetorics of Sameness and Difference in the Work of Hugo Grotius," in eds. Victoria Kahn and Lorna Hutson, Rhetoric and Law in the Early Modern Period (Yale, 2001), 285-31, at 311 fn46.

³⁹³ 1689 tr., IV.xi.123-4.

³⁹⁴ E.g. 1689 tr., V.vi.134-5!

³⁹⁵ Contrast, for instance, Isaac La Peyr  re (1596-1676), who in his 1655 Prae-Adamitae, IV.iv begins from the same principles to explain and interpret miracles, but ends with the opposite conclusion: "Such men as these think all things that people believe will not believe Religion & Divinity, & miracles with them have the greater repute of sanctity, the more incredible they are; and which is a strange thing, the more they are past belief, the more they believe them: I Ingenuously confesse, I doe not give in my name amongst those enormous upholders of miracles, who put all reason out of square. I am reasonable, and any thing that is belonging to reason I pretend an interest in it." Men before Adam (London, 1656), IV.v.234. On IV.xiv.276-81, La Peyr  re recounts that he showed Grotius an early manuscript version of his book.

Grotius also consistently and systematically undermines his own rational arguments for the truth of Christianity, and does so with logical fallacies that were recognisable to any of his educated readers who were familiar with Aristotle (and were in fact pointed out by several of them). The various statements that the core of Christianity commands perfect consensus, and its spread proves its truth, beg the question and raison d'être of the whole De veritate, as it is laid out in its Introduction and Conclusion. Grotius's presentation of the evidence, for instance in II.vi. that Jesus' miracles were not assisted by the devil, often involves a petitio principii. One of Grotius's arguments for the Bible's textual integrity is another case of this logical error, laid out in a straightforward, easy-to-recognise manner.³⁹⁶ The paradox of Peter's credibility, based chiefly on the truth of his self-presentation as a liar, is discussed in Section 2.5 above. The reasoning in I.xx regarding the soul surviving the body is a textbook case of circulus in probando, as is the argument in Book III that prophetic passages in the Bible, though obscure at the time of writing, are justified by later events that prove those passages to have been inspired by divine revelation.³⁹⁷ We saw several cases of faulty generalisation (often the specific form a dicto secundum quid ad dictum simpliciter) or ignoratio elenchi, for example when Grotius deduced from Christianity's geographical spread its truth, from all Christians' consensus the validity of its core doctrines, from all Christians' consensus the canonicity of the Old and New Testament, or from Jewish, pagan and other critics' universal consensus the credibility of the Apostles and early teachers. In addition, he undermines several of these premises in De veritate himself, and/or presents them in a form that is calculated to strike his readers as absurd. It almost seems as if in his defense of Christianity, Grotius ran through a check list of logical fallacies that were most recognisable to his contemporaries.³⁹⁸ These are not likely to be mistakes, especially since his friends pointed out some of them.³⁹⁹

De veritate is a didactic exercise. It begins with a call for shared reason to suspend the doctrinal baggage. It imposes severe restrictions on the capacity of reason to prove Christianity, and weaves numerous self-contradictions and logical fallacies through and through the fabric of the book. However, if these steps were not enough, Grotius spells out the lesson in the Conclusion. Read the Bible. Do not follow uncritically the authority of other readers.⁴⁰⁰

³⁹⁶ Mentioned in Section 5.1 above, 1629 ed., III.127.

³⁹⁷ 1629 ed., III.110-1.

³⁹⁸ Aristotle's Prior Analytics and Organon are among popular sources of such lists. Jacopo Zabarella (1533-89), who taught Arminius at Padua, builds on Aristotle an excellent checklist of such logical fallacies in Opera Logica.

³⁹⁹ Heering, Grotius, 12-14!

⁴⁰⁰ Champion's formulation of the broader importance of this move is spot on: "'Socinianism,'" 126-7. I suggest that the "radical complexion" and political message that De veritate assumed in the eighteenth century, as Champion explains, also existed in the United Provinces after the Synod of Dordt. Although De veritate served different functions in eighteenth-century political contexts, it was hardly less subversive in its own (pace Champion, "Socinianism," 135). Seeing De veritate merely as a milder forerunner of Enlightenment manoeuvres, including the

Most biblical truths cannot be confirmed by reason.⁴⁰¹ Ignore rites and ceremonies. What you cannot understand, you must take on trust, and believe it. These steps are necessary to preserve social order.⁴⁰² Earlier emphases on reason were necessary to bring all readers to the text, but by the Conclusion it is clear that the reasonableness of Christianity is a red herring.⁴⁰³

There are two implications of this interpretation. One is that Grotius remained committed to the specific version of epistemic humility that characterised the Leiden Circle before it was reproved by the Synod of Dordt.⁴⁰⁴ Whether it was his endogenous development of the Leiden Circle's epistemic humility, or a reaction to Dordt, Grotius came to think that his best chance of convincing his reader that faith, not reason, was the paramount reason to believe in Christianity, was to first appeal to the reader's self-perception as rational and autonomous by offering seemingly rational proofs, including the prospect of reward and the efficacy of sola Scriptura without the authority of any exegetical tradition and established churches; and then to gradually and deliberately subvert all reasonable proofs offered. The second import of reading De veritate as a case of didactic secularisation is that Grotius remained consistent in prioritising political concord above establishing religious truth. The well-known and striking statement, that it is more important to be a good citizen than to be a good Christian, is the key to both the content and structure of De veritate.⁴⁰⁵ political disempowerment of clergy and the declaration of the "principle of self-determination of belief" (Champion, "Socinianism," 136), cannot account either for the various ways in which De veritate differed from the apologetic-irenical genre of Vives, Mornay and others, to which it claimed to belong; or for its ostensible self-contradictions and glaring errors. The didactic secularising interpretation can, without affecting the interpretation of De veritate's eighteenth-century uses, or even clarifying and enhancing them.

⁴⁰¹ Even the strong version of this claim of course predates Protestantism, e.g. in the oft-cited fides non habet meritum cui humana ratio prebet experimentum. Gregory, Hom. in Ev. II.26.1, in PL 76, 1197C. Not only obvious authors like Aquinas, but even Fitzherbert's Boke of Husbandry, discussed in chapter 3 above, cites it (¶161, 111). Incidentally, Fitzherbert may be replying to, or even drawing from, the great reformer or heretic John Wycliffe (c. 1320-84) here. In Book III, chapter 3 of Wycliffe's Triologus, the character Phronesis describes faith and reason the same way, and cites Gregory's maxim (tr. Stephen E. Lahey, Cambridge, 2013; p. 117). The Triologus was the best known work by Wycliffe at the time, and the first to be printed (1525). Just a few pages later Fitzherbert praises the Gift of Tongues for its potential to "conuerte all the infydeles, heretykes, and lollers in the worlde." ¶167, 116.

⁴⁰² 1689 tr. VI.xi.184-5.

⁴⁰³ An attempt to explicitly map out this strategy can be found in Matthew Hale, The Primitive Origination of Mankind (publ. 1677, from notes made throughout his life), including I.ii.63, III.i.246, III.v.165-7 and III.vi.283.

⁴⁰⁴ Somos, Secularisation.

⁴⁰⁵ Grotius, Rivetiani Apologetici... in Opera Theologica (Basel, 1732), IV.679-745, at 701, b32-36. Cited on Heering, Grotius, 72. This is perfectly in keeping with Nellen, "Minimalism," 26: "Grotius was an advocate and homo rhetoricus whose eclecticism encouraged him to make points rather than hold views." For a parallel case of these two implications, applied to Hobbes, see Evrigenis, Images.