Title: Monument of nature? An ethnography of the world heritage of Mt. Kenya

Issue Date: 2016-05-25

NOTES

² The upcoming body of literature on organizations (see for instance Gellner & Hirsch 2001; Harper 1998; Hilhorst 2003) and the upcoming body of literature on elites (see for instance Lutz 2005; Salverda & Abbink 2013; Shore & Nugent 2002) suggest that anthropologists are increasingly making efforts in this direction.

³ Publications may destroy the relationship with one's informants and anthropological writing may alienate the researcher from the researched. Mosse (2006) maintains that, even though this can create very uncomfortable situations, it should not be taken as an indicator of the quality of one's work – he suggests that the social does not necessarily have to be analysed socially, and rejects the idea that evidence is always a matter of consensus (Ibid.: 947).

⁵ Conversation on 31 October 2011, UNESCO Regional Office for Eastern Africa in Nairobi.

⁸ UNESCO introduced the category 'cultural landscape' in 1992 (UNESCO 2008^B: 8).

⁹ Brumann (2014^A) further suggests that cultural heritage scholars are divided into two strands of thought: first there are heritage believers who aim to preserve heritage and accept that heritage has an intrinsic value, and second there are heritage atheists who take a critical position and seek to undermine contemporary conservation practices. Perhaps such a separation is discernable among scholars, yet it seems unsustainable in the heritage conservation scene. Chapter two shows that the initiator of Mt. Kenya's 1997 World Heritage designation was neither a heritage believer, nor a heritage critic – rather he responded to the call to nominate Mt. Kenya opportunistically, and simply let the process take its course.

- ¹⁴ These debates again fostered the production of authoritative texts, including the IUCN report Outstanding Universal Value, Standards for Natural Heritage, a Compendium on Standards for Inscription on the World Heritage List published in 2008; the ICOMOS report What is OUV? Defining the Outstanding Value of Cultural World Heritage Properties also published in 2008; and document WHC.06/30.COM/9 published by the World Heritage Centre in 2006 on the evaluation of Outstanding Universal Value.
- ¹⁵ At the time of writing the World Heritage List counted 1031 heritage sites.

- ²¹ In Born in Africa: the Quest for the Origins of Human Life (2011) Meredith discusses the professional rivalry and competition between father and son.
- ²² This idea is also challenged in the landmark study of Fairhead & Leach (1996).

- ²⁴ In 1965, the boundaries of Mt. Kenya National Park were slightly lowered to 10,500 feet, and in 1968, two tourist tracks leading to the Sirimon Gate and the Naro Moru Gate were added (VanLeeuwe 2004: 175).

- ³⁵ In 2012 the trust's CEO expressed to me her dissatisfaction about the colonial and military associations that the name Bill Woodley invoked. By the end of 2014 Bill Woodley's name was removed from the trust's website and logo, and today the organization continues under the name Mt. Kenya Trust.
- ³⁶ The manuscript was published posthumously under the title The Southern Kikuyu Before 1903 (1977).
- ³⁷ The Coryndon Museum was the forerunner of the National Museums of Kenya that, as the previous chapter pointed out, Louis Leakey's son Richard Leakey directed until 1989.
- ³⁸ But see Berman & Lonsdale (1991: 184) who suggest that Leakey walked out of the trial himself after the defendants' leading counsel, called Dennis Pritt, had complained about his impartiality.
- ³⁹ A nostalgia among colonial agents for colonized cultures as they 'traditionally' were, which is paradoxical for the colonial encounter itself affected these cultures (Rosaldo 1989: 107). Rosaldo deliberately uses the term nostalgia because it comes with strong emotions of longing and has an innocent touch to it, which effectively draws attention away from the fundamental inequality that set the conditions for the emergence of such emotions in the first place (Ibid.:120).
- ⁴⁰ The psychiatrist J.C. Carothers as well as the sensational writings of authors such as Robert Ruark further cemented this official narrative (Clough 2003: 254), as did political scientists who clung to the modernization theory of political evolution (Lonsdale 1992^C: 270-272).
- ⁴¹ Already in 1954 the anthropologist Max Gluckman rejected this official narrative. Newspapers habitually reported on the Mau Mau as back-to-the-bush, but Gluckman suggested that the Mau Mau rebellion was the product of a clash between cultures rather than a revitalization of pre-colonial religious and cultural practices (Gluckman 1963).
- ⁴² Soon after NaRC's election victory Mwai Kibaki and Raila Odinga fell out with one another. It has been suggested that this was largely caused by dissatisfaction on Odinga's side. In the run-up to the elections Odinga had stayed in the background and had publicly endorsed Kibaki's presidential candidacy, on the agreement that afterwards he would have his share in the division of ministerial posts and other influential positions. When Kibaki began to shape his government Odinga felt he was not rewarded sufficiently – tensions worsened further when Kibaki invited some former KANU politicians into cabinet (Lynch 2006^B: 242).
- ⁴³ Coombes & Hughes (2014) have also warned against understanding the alliances of Kenyan politicians only in terms of tribal background.

⁴⁵ Conversation on 5 July 2012.

⁴⁶ After Joseph Thomson spotted Mt. Kenya in December 1883 different adventurers followed in his footsteps and attempted to explore the mountain. Among them were Sámuel Teleki, who visited in 1887 (Mackinder 1900: 453); John Walter Gregory, who visited in 1893 (see The Geographical Journal of 1893 p. 326-327, author unknown); Captain F.G. Dundas, who visited in 1892 (Gedge 1892); Georg Kolb, who visited some time between 1894 and 1896 (see The Geographical Journal of 1899 p. 672, author unknown); Halford John Mackinder, who visited in 1899 (see Barbour 1991); and John W. Arthur, who visited no less than six times between 1909 and 1923 (see Arthur 1923). Of all these men only Mackinder managed to scale Mt. Kenya's highest peak. Yet for more than ninety years little was known about this particular expedition, and Mackinder's logbooks were only published posthumously in the early 1990s (Barbour 1991).

⁶⁶ Hardin (1968) argued that all public natural resources will deplete sooner or later for individuals will pursue maximum gain, which will result in deterioration. Ecologists and environmentalists continue to use Hardin's work, but his strong focus on the need to limit population growth in order to prevent tragedies of the commons make the article controversial – in fact, one could read it as a manifesto for state control over family planning.

¹⁰⁶ See Visweswaran (1998) for inconsistencies in the anti-racist rhetoric of Franz Boas himself.
