About the author

Henrietta M. Nyamnjoh graduated from the Ecole Normale Supérieure in Yaoundé as a secondary-school teacher in 1998 and taught English as a second language in Cameroon, Botswana and Senegal for many years. She obtained an MPhil in Development Studies from the African Studies Centre at Leiden University in the Netherlands in 2009. Her thesis, which examined the mass migration of fishermen from Senegal to the Canary Islands in an attempt to understand their motives for leaving their home country, was entitled “We get nothing from fishing”: Fishing for boat opportunities amongst Senegalese fisher migrants. In 2010, she enrolled in a fulltime PhD programme at Leiden University where she has been researching Cameroonian migrant communities in South Africa and the Netherlands and how they are adopting new Information and Communication Technologies (ICTs) to remain in touch with their families in their home villages.
