

Universiteit
Leiden
The Netherlands

Moving along the roadside: A social history of Mwinilunga District, 1870s-1970s

Pesa, I.

Citation

Pesa, I. (2014, September 29). Moving along the roadside: A social history of Mwinilunga District, 1870s-1970s. Retrieved from <https://hdl.handle.net/1887/28744>

Version: Corrected Publisher's Version

License: Licence agreement concerning inclusion of doctoral thesis in the Institutional Repository of the University of Leiden

Downloaded from: <https://hdl.handle.net/1887/28744>

Note: To cite this publication please use the final published version (if applicable).

Cover Page

Universiteit Leiden

The handle <http://hdl.handle.net/1887/28744> holds various files of this Leiden University dissertation.

Author: Peša, Iva

Title: Moving along the roadside : a social history of Mwinilunga District, 1870s-1970s

Issue Date: 2014-09-23

Moving along the roadside

A social history of Mwinilunga District, 1870s-1970s

Proefschrift

ter verkrijging van

de graad van Doctor aan de Universiteit Leiden, op gezag van Rector Magnificus prof.mr. C.J.J.M. Stolker, volgens besluit van het College voor Promoties te verdedigen op dinsdag 23 september 2014

klokke 15.00 uur

door

Iva Peša

geboren te Zadar, Kroatië in 1987

Promotiecommissie

Promotoren:

Prof. dr. R.J. Ross

Prof. dr. J-B. Gewalt

Overige leden:

Prof. dr. J.K. van Donge (University of Papua-New Guinea)

Prof. dr. E. Frankema (Wageningen University)

Prof. dr. P.C.M. Hoppenbrouwers

Copyright © Iva Peša, Leiden

Cover design: Photograph by Iva Peša, Mwinilunga, 2008

Druk: CPI Wöhrmann Print Service – Zutphen

Acknowledgements

The journey of this PhD thesis was a long road. This thesis could not have been written without the assistance and contributions of other people, friends, colleagues and family. This is a humble attempt to thank those who undertook the journey with me and supported me along the way.

I would like to thank my supervisors, Jan-Bart Gewald and Robert Ross. Not only for their insightful comments, academic support and numerous conversations, but especially because they believed in me and motivated me to pursue this research. Their comments and support proved formative and invaluable. Without your contributions, this thesis would never have been possible.

Large parts of this research have been conducted in Zambia. The first time I set foot in Zambia in 2007, it reminded me of the island where my grandmother lives in Croatia and where I used to spend most of my summer holidays, riding my grandfather's donkey and picking grapes whilst running away from the wasps. The resemblance of the landscape and the welcoming attitude of the people I met during my short stay made me feel at home. This motivated me to conduct a study on the agricultural history of Zambia. My supervisor Jan-Bart Gewald proposed Mwinilunga District. Although I knew nothing about the area, I decided to give it a try and I have never regretted the choice.

So many people have helped me along the way, during research trips in 2008 and 2010. In Lusaka I have spent many hours digging through archival records at the National Archives of Zambia, where Marja Hinfelaar and the members of staff provided me with enormous assistance. They collected numerous boxes for me, gave me tips on how to understand the archives, but also made me feel at ease in Lusaka. It was a truly pleasant experience to do research at the National Archives of Zambia and to interact with the staff, other researchers and the students I met along the way. Much shorter research trips were made to the United National Independence Party archives in Lusaka and to the Zambia Consolidated Copper Mines archives in Ndola. The assistance and material there were extremely valuable.

In Lusaka my stay was made extremely pleasant due to the friendship of Madeleen Husselman and the inhabitants of 21 Ngulube Road, which came to feel like home. Marja Hinfelaar and the University of Zambia provided me with institutional affiliation and academic assistance, for which I am truly grateful. Walima Kalusa provided me a valuable introduction to Lusaka and shared his experiences of doing research in Mwinilunga with me, for which I remain grateful. Special thanks go to Leah Samakayi, who came to my house every day and taught me Lunda, even when my pronunciation was ridiculous and my grammar horrible. Thank you for your patience, friendship and lessons in Lunda culture.

I spent one month in Ndola, where Theresa Maseka welcomed me to her house and made me feel at home. Next to being my host, she was my research assistant. She practiced Lunda speech with me and located Lunda migrants on the Copperbelt for interviews. Her meals, patience and jokes made my stay truly enjoyable. Webster tirelessly retrieved the documents at the ZCCM archives for me, but also proved a good conversation partner and companion. The Lunda language lessons which Harriet offered me were amazing. Not only did she teach me the grammar and vocabulary, she also taught me how to apply all the language rules in practical situations. Without her help I could never have felt so comfortable in Mwinilunga.

Most of all, I am indebted to the people who shared their stories, friendship and lives with me in Mwinilunga District. When I first came to Mwinilunga, Julian Chiyezi and her family welcomed me, introduced me and assisted me in setting up the research. She and her family have remained instrumental and I am happy that they got the opportunity to meet my parents. Tunasakilili nankashi. The agricultural department of Mwinilunga provided logistical support, by driving me around on their motorbikes, facilitating my stays in various chiefdoms through their officers and most importantly by becoming my friends and colleagues. Special thanks go to Ambrose Musanda and his son Peter, who made me feel like an equal, instead of a stranger. Without your friendship my stay would not have been the same. For my stays in the district I would especially like to thank those who opened their homes to me, shared their meals with me and assisted me as translators, assistants and friends. Although they are too numerous to mention, special thanks go to Daniel Chinshe, the Kamuhuza family, the Jinguluka family, the Kalota family and the Kambidima family. Senior Chief Kanongesha provided me the freedom and the assistance to conduct my research, for which I remain thankful. You all made the days, evenings, weeks and months memorable and enjoyable. Cooking, washing clothes and just chatting with you inspired this thesis in numerous ways. Gibby Kamuhuza tirelessly cycled through the district with me, located 'knowledgeable elders' and engaged in learning 'deep Lunda' proverbs and explaining these to me. The lives and stories of the numerous elders whom I interviewed are the foundations upon which this thesis is built, and even if your names have not been explicitly mentioned, I sincerely hope to have done justice to what you have shared with me. This thesis could not have been written without your experiences and stories.

In the United Kingdom I conducted shorter spells of archival work at the Rhodes House Library, the Public Records office and at the John Ryland's Library in Manchester. My special thanks go to Graham Johnson who made the Echoes of Service archival records accessible to me. It was extremely pleasant and informative to meet Betty Denning, the wife of the former colonial officer R.C. Denning, whose notes are deposited at the Rhodes House. Thank you for sharing your stories, pictures and afternoon with me.

The institutional assistance provided by the NWO, the 'Muskets to Nokias' project, the Institute for History and the African Studies Centre at Leiden University proved invaluable. The CART group, a wonderful initiative by a unique group of people, provided a prolific and supportive academic environment. The inspiration and assistance provided by Marja Hinfelaar, Giacomo Macola and Hugh Macmillan in particular were valuable. I hope that this community continues to conduct research in the field of Central African history. Most inspirational has been my fellow PhD colleague, Mary Davies. Mary is the most enthusiastic practitioner of African history whom I know, and it has been a joy to share the office with her for two years. The conversations in Leiden with Esther van Eijk, Sophie Feyder, Mariana Perry, Paul Swanepoel and the PhD students in History and African History have been insightful, inspirational and uplifting. Thank you for being there when I needed to complain about something trivial or for drinking coffee with me, it made the writing process so much more enjoyable. Thanks also go to the students whom I had the joy of teaching over 2011, 2012 and 2014 – you probably taught me more than I could teach you and you showed me why African history is something to always be enthusiastic about!

A very special thanks go to those who will not find their names back in this thesis, but who have inspired and supported me along the way. You have been there with me and you have been able to motivate me and to lift me up, even during the times that I was preparing and writing this thesis and when I was quite frankly not one of the nicest persons to be around. It is my sincere intention to reciprocate all your attention, support and ceaseless confidence one day. Dear friends, dear Lina, Anna and Annika, dear Mom and Dad, thank you! The person who did his utmost best to assist me with this thesis is Ivo. He printed, copied and did annoying computer-related things for me, he proofread boring chapters but said they were interesting, but most importantly he supported me and he was endlessly patient. His dedication to me resulted in the completion of this thesis and in the birth of our beautiful son Bruno in May 2013. Bruno and Ivo thank you for being there, without you this thesis would be insignificant.

Thank you all for going on this journey with me, hopefully the following pages can do you justice. Without you it would not have been the same.

Contents

|                                                                                                            |     |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Introduction .....                                                                                         | 1   |
| Conceptualising social change: The Rhodes Livingstone Institute and Victor Turner .....                    | 7   |
| Reconceptualising continuity and change: Theories, narratives and representations .....                    | 10  |
| Continuity and change: Debates on labour migration, capitalism and kinship.....                            | 11  |
| A local history of social change .....                                                                     | 15  |
| Approach, aims and method .....                                                                            | 17  |
| Chapter outline .....                                                                                      | 24  |
| 1: Pathways through the past .....                                                                         | 27  |
| Constructing a region: The Lunda entity, history and reproduction.....                                     | 28  |
| A window to the world: Long-distance trade and slavery .....                                               | 34  |
| Engaging the metropole: Colonial rule and local negotiation .....                                          | 40  |
| ‘Cinderella gets the ball at her feet’: Food, labour and roads .....                                       | 48  |
| The birth of a nation? Independence and beyond .....                                                       | 52  |
| Conclusion .....                                                                                           | 56  |
| 2: Production.....                                                                                         | 58  |
| The foundations of production in Mwinilunga District.....                                                  | 60  |
| Production and debates on the ‘moral economy’ .....                                                        | 62  |
| From shifting cultivation to fixed farming: Policies and practice.....                                     | 65  |
| On subsistence and market production .....                                                                 | 68  |
| Meal: Markets, state policies and values .....                                                             | 70  |
| Cassava: Creating a land of plenty .....                                                                   | 73  |
| Maize: Faltering towards modernity? .....                                                                  | 75  |
| The foundations of production: Staples, markets and the state .....                                        | 76  |
| Meat: Hunting, herding and distribution.....                                                               | 79  |
| Hunting: Meat, merit and masculinity.....                                                                  | 80  |
| Herding: A source of meat, a source of money .....                                                         | 85  |
| Ideological frameworks, marketing and administrative control: The co-existence of hunting and herding..... | 88  |
| Beeswax .....                                                                                              | 90  |
| Pineapples .....                                                                                           | 94  |
| The rationale of market production .....                                                                   | 97  |
| Conclusion .....                                                                                           | 100 |
| 3A: Mobility.....                                                                                          | 103 |

|                                                                                                          |     |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Historical roots of mobility .....                                                                       | 106 |
| Drawing and crossing borders: An 'imaginary line' on the map .....                                       | 108 |
| Cross-border trade: Calico, cigarettes and cassava .....                                                 | 110 |
| Trading rubber: Crossing borders, making profit and asserting autonomy .....                             | 111 |
| Circuits of trade: Legality, entrepreneurship and the state .....                                        | 112 |
| Moving along the border: Migration, identity and the state .....                                         | 117 |
| Population movement, refugees and identity .....                                                         | 119 |
| The politics of belonging: Crafting and challenging the nation-state .....                               | 121 |
| Conclusion .....                                                                                         | 124 |
| 3B: Labour Migration .....                                                                               | 127 |
| From 'lazy natives' to 'able-bodied men': Constructing the idea of work .....                            | 128 |
| Taxation, tax evasion and the control of labour .....                                                    | 130 |
| Going to work: Stereotypes, recruitment and the origins of labour migration .....                        | 135 |
| Comparing the Copperbelts: Work and mobility .....                                                       | 138 |
| Of modernist narratives and social connectivity: Motives for labour migration .....                      | 141 |
| Money, consumption and building wealth .....                                                             | 143 |
| Social connectivity and self-realisation: The socio-cultural dynamics of labour migration .....          | 145 |
| Decay or boom? Labour migration and local livelihoods.....                                               | 151 |
| Conclusion .....                                                                                         | 161 |
| 4: Consumption .....                                                                                     | 164 |
| From locally produced to store-bought goods: Exchange and the creation of value .....                    | 165 |
| Production and exchange: The foundations of trade .....                                                  | 166 |
| Goods, value and meaning: Wealth in people and self-realisation .....                                    | 170 |
| Ironworking: Smelters, smiths and craftsmanship.....                                                     | 173 |
| The practice of ironworking in Mwinilunga .....                                                          | 173 |
| Mass-manufactured iron tools: Competition or opportunity? .....                                          | 175 |
| Cloth, clothing and culture .....                                                                        | 179 |
| Bark cloth and animal skins: The meaning and value of clothing .....                                     | 180 |
| From imported goods to objects of local desire: The spread and attractions of manufactured clothing..... | 182 |
| Clothing consumption, production and social relationships.....                                           | 186 |
| Clothing, culture and self-realisation.....                                                              | 188 |
| Grass, mud and bricks: Housing, community and permanence .....                                           | 191 |
| Grass, mud and the meaning of housing .....                                                              | 193 |
| Promoting 'improved' housing: Official attempts at housing reform .....                                  | 195 |

|                                                                                                 |     |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Goods, people and wealth: The rationale of consumption .....                                    | 201 |
| Conclusion .....                                                                                | 207 |
| 5: Villages .....                                                                               | 210 |
| Villages and farms: Settlement patterns, social organisation and authority .....                | 211 |
| Chiefs, headmen and authority: Governance and mediation .....                                   | 215 |
| Village leadership in a historical perspective.....                                             | 219 |
| Colonial adaptation: Authority, recognition and village fission .....                           | 221 |
| Village leadership within the Zambian nation-state .....                                        | 224 |
| Competition, co-operation and relationships: Reciprocity, accumulation and power .....          | 225 |
| Work parties and piecework: Co-operation or competition? .....                                  | 225 |
| Sharing a meal: Food, power and hierarchy .....                                                 | 230 |
| Witchcraft, jealousy and power: Discourses on accumulation and sharing .....                    | 235 |
| Witchcraft as a discourse about fertility, wealth and power .....                               | 236 |
| Kinship, gender and the family: Social relationships and individualisation .....                | 243 |
| Men and women: Contestation, co-operation and accumulation within the household .....           | 243 |
| Cultivating separate fields: Labour, gender and property .....                                  | 248 |
| Marriage: Households, kinship and social connectivity .....                                     | 250 |
| Kinship, wealth in people and individualisation .....                                           | 252 |
| Social change, continuity and reconfiguration: Disputes, rituals and value transformation ..... | 255 |
| Rituals, conflict and reconciliation.....                                                       | 256 |
| Continuity and change in village life .....                                                     | 260 |
| Conclusion .....                                                                                | 261 |
| Conclusion .....                                                                                | 264 |
| Sources .....                                                                                   | 269 |

