Acknowledgments

I am profoundly grateful to my former supervisors, who taught me the basics of studying literature when I was a master's student at Hokkaido University: Professor Emeritus Zensuke Taira and Professor Teruhiko Nagao. I thank the editors and referees of the Kyoto-based academic journal Bungaku to Hyoron (Letters and Essays) for giving valuable comments on the articles I submitted, some of which laid the basis for parts of the present dissertation. I owe my sincere gratitude to Rita DeCoursey for stylistic suggestions on the text of the dissertation. Carla Teune's kind support during and after my stay in Leiden kept me going with my study until the end. I have had encouragement from many other friends and colleagues, as well as my parents, to whom I am truly grateful. My special thanks also to my husband, Fubito Endo, who helped me refine my ideas, at different stages of the writing, by listening to me and giving many insightful comments.

Permission

Chapter 3 of this dissertation is a revised version of my article "The Death of a Woman Artist: The Female Other in Letitia Landon's Dramatic Monologue", appearing in Women's Studies, 36 (4), June 2007, and is included here by permission of the publisher, Taylor & Francis Ltd.
