Acknowledgments

In bringing this dissertation to completion, I have depended on the help and support of many people, to whom I am greatly indebted. Especially because this dissertation did not come about in the most straightforward of fashions, I am truly thankful to every single person who has provided even the slightest contribution, in whatever way, to the thinking, reading, talking, and writing that has gone into this project.

204 In general, I would like to express my gratitude to everyone who has ever been kind enough to show interest in my work, asking me sensible questions and courteously accepting my often fuzzy answers. Conversations with and the perspectives of others have been vital to getting into view more precisely what it was that I was trying to say. So, simply put, I am indebted to everyone who has ever kindly permitted me to harp on about literature, cities, or the postmodern.

There are, of course, also specific people to whom I wish to express my gratitude here. Firstly, I would like to express my deepest gratitude to my supervisor, Ernst van Alphen, for his guidance throughout, but above all for his confidence and support in beginning and persevering with this project in the first place. Thanks also to my co-supervisor, Peter Verstraten, whose feedback added a valuable perspective that particularly helped in the final stages of the project. Likewise, thanks also to Esther Peeren, who supervised my MA thesis in Literary Studies at the University of Amsterdam, which served as the basis for my second chapter here. I would also like to express my gratitude to Gene Moore, who, apart from being the supervisor on my first MA thesis in English literature at the UvA, has been my first example of how to be a scholar in the humanities and who has helped me on my way in my career in academia.

In addition, I would like to thank the organizers of and the participants in the different seminars I have been allowed to take part in over the years – the theory seminars at Leiden’s LUICD and the UvA’s ASCA, and the Cities seminar at ASCA as well. These seminars provided valuable advanced training, a welcoming and stimulating academic environment, and a platform for meeting other PhD students – which has always been not just productive, but also (and importantly) great fun.

Furthermore, I would like to thank the people at the Literary Studies department in Leiden, and at the Institute for Cultural Disciplines (recently renamed LUCAS). They have been kind, helpful, and have made me feel welcome, making for a great environment for working on my dissertation – even if I spent much of my time writing elsewhere. On that note, my thanks also to all the coffee places and cafes in and around the Vondelpark and Kinkerstraat in Amsterdam – whose coffee and sandwiches fueled the work for this dissertation – for letting me sit there with my laptop and with my headphones on for hours on end. Thanks also to my friend Rinze for taking care of the layout and design of my dissertation.

I would also like to thank my colleagues from Tilburg University, where I worked as a teacher while also working on my PhD. It would have been a great deal more difficult to complete this dissertation without their understanding and sympathy for the juggling act I have been trying to pull off – for which I should particularly mention my (old) boss Riet Bettonviel. I think that it is rare for an organization and its people to show such support for further academic development.

On a more personal note, I would like to mention how important it has been to have close friends, who I could always turn to, because working on a PhD project taxes more than just the intellect. The countless discussions over the years, whether over cocktails or coffee, have always helped me to keep things in perspective. In addition, I'd like to thank Eva; I think that sitting next to each other on the couch, both writing the introductions to our dissertations, will capture why.

I am also greatly indebted to my parents, for their continued loving support throughout the entire course of this project. To counteract the frustration and tension that comes with a PhD project, I could always rely on my mother's unfailing trust in the fact that everything would fall into place if I just kept at it. I would like to thank my father for being my sounding board for new ideas, for having read many versions of the chapters of this dissertation, and for giving me invaluable feedback on them that has kept my mind open and sharp. If I may now think of myself as having at least some expertise when it comes to the matters addressed in this book, he may too.

Lastly, and certainly not unimportantly, I am very grateful to the Netherlands Organisation for Scientific Research (NWO) for providing me with a grant that enabled me to take a sabbatical that allowed me to complete my dissertation.
