Acknowledgements

My research could not have been possible without funding by the NWO (Netherlands Organisation for Scientific Research). The PhD candidates, post-docs and senior researchers of the NWO Horizon project, in particular Marcus Düwell, have supported me tremendously by reading first drafts and discussing difficult parts of my study, and with their companionship and collegiality.

In addition, I owe a great thanks to my Master's thesis supervisor Esther Peeren for believing in my ability to start and complete a PhD project, for which I thank her profoundly.

I would also like to express appreciation to my research institute Leiden University Centre for Arts in Society (LUCAS) and the Leiden University Fund (LUF) for financing my semester abroad at the Film Studies department of King's College London. A special thanks goes to Kitty Zijlmans for her support while in her former function as Director of LUCAS, and to Korrie Korevaart, Lia ten Brink and Viola Stoop for facilitating my work in Leiden considerably.

Colleagues from the Film and Literature Studies department, especially Maria Boletsi, Janna Houwen, Pepita Hesselberth, Frans-Willem Korsten, Yasco Horsman and Ernst van Alphen have, through our conversations, the seminars they organised and the Bachelor's and Master's courses they allowed me to teach in, made me feel particularly welcome in Leiden throughout my project.

I am indebted to my fellow PhD candidates Sara Polak, Jenny Weston, David Louwrier, Anna Dlabacova, Jacqueline Hylkema, Linda Blijenberg, Max van Duijn, Maarten Jansen, Emma de Vries, Inge 't Hart, Tessa de Zeeuw, Looi van Kessel and countless others for their companionship during my time on the PhD Council, while organising the LUCAS Graduate Conference, and during the monthly PhD lunches. A special thanks goes to Jenneka Janzen, who, apart from being my partner in crime while editing the LUCAS Journal, has saved my thesis from embarrassing typos and Dutchisms.

The research schools OSL and ASCA have brought me into contact with a great number of brilliant researchers who have, during theory seminars, workshops, and informal gatherings, greatly inspired me over the years.

Catherine Wheatley, Richard Dyer, and my fellow PhD candidates and Master's students at King's College have helped me structure my thoughts and writing and made my time in London absolutely priceless and valuable.

Additionally, Tamas David-Barrett, Anna Rotkirch, Rafael Wlodarski, Bronwyn Tarr, Isabel Behncke and James Carney have not only granted me valuable insights but also tremendous kindness the numerous times I visited Max in Oxford.

Lastly, a warm thanks goes to all my dear friends and family for their enduring support, patience, and understanding. I particularly thank Amira, Lotte, Nienke, Feline, Siri, Ca, Thijs, Adam and Dennys, my sister Lisa, my parents Marianne and Jan, Max's parents Aad and Mia, Niels, Frank, Ellen, Justin, and, last but not least, my darling nieces Emilie and Isabel and nephew Bram, whose sweet little faces have given me so much happiness in the last stages of completing this thesis.

I dedicate this thesis to Max and to my parents, who have, in addition to unconditionally believing in me, helped me to stay calm and finish this study.
