

Global China's human touch? The internationalisation of Chinese NGOs

Wang, Y.

Citation

Wang, Y. (2024, January 17). Global China's human touch?: The internationalisation of Chinese NGOs. Retrieved from https://hdl.handle.net/1887/3713742

Version: Publisher's Version

License: License agreement concerning inclusion of doctoral thesis in the

Institutional Repository of the University of Leiden

Downloaded from: https://hdl.handle.net/1887/3713742

Note: To cite this publication please use the final published version (if applicable).

PROPOSITIONS

- 1. The internationalisation of Chinese NGOs is still in an emerging stage and its current scale remains limited.
- 2. The internationalisation of most Chinese NGOs is not directly initiated and managed by the Chinese state.
- 3. Chinese NGOs are not capable of taking action and developing discourses that are completely independent of the Chinese state.
- 4. Chinese NGOs are not directly state-led; instead, the state's influence has mainly affected Chinese NGOs through their embeddedness in the existing domestic regulatory system and in society at large, where the Chinese state powerfully shapes legitimacy.
- 5. Chinese NGOs, explicitly or implicitly, "diplomatise" their activities when developing international projects and act as Chinese soft power promoters, even without direct requests to that effect from the Chinese state.
- 6. Comparing the development practices of OECD Development Assistance Committee member countries and China is like comparing apples to oranges.
- 7. Pragmatism is one of the major "Chinese characteristics", evident in the international endeavours of both state and non-state actors in China.
- 8. The Belt and Road Initiative is a panacea for both researchers who study Global China, and Chinese NGO practitioners who engage in international projects. Both use it to justify their respective endeavours.
- 9. The concept of a "Government-Organized Non-Governmental Organization (GONGO)" may seem a nonsensical oxymoron, but in some contexts it is an indispensable one.
- 10. Don't tell a Chinese interviewee that your field of study is Chinese Studies.