Acknowledgments

Where to even start when writing words of thanks for a project that has been supported by so many wonderful people along the way? From the initial idea to the formal submission, this project took exactly five years to complete. This period was never once uneventful, filled with numerous research trips, repeated lockdowns, and some overlap with a demanding teaching position in the final year. Nothing was more valuable in all of this than having a solid support network that cheered me on along the way.

From the moment the idea for this dissertation emerged, it was clear that it was going to be a challenging one to write. Though I was convinced there was a story to be told, there was little literature to back up my idea, while the relevant primary sources were tucked away deep into the archives. Luckily, this did not stop my supervisors, Damian Pargas and Giles Scott-Smith, from taking a chance on me. I am beyond thankful for their decision, as well as their continuous patience, guidance, and encouragement over the following years. The same applies to my co-supervisor, Peter Meel, who came on board later but whose input and support have been of equal importance.

For most of my PhD, I had the pleasure of being based at the Roosevelt Institute for American Studies in Middelburg, which not only funded my project but also welcomed me into its tight-knit community. I feel so grateful for my colleagues there: Celia Nijdam, Paul Brennan, Nanka de Vries, Cees Heere, Marcella Schute, Christine Mertens, Manar Ellethy, Dario Fazzi, Gaetano Di Tomasso, our many interns and visiting fellows, and of course Leontien Jousse. Although I appreciate all of you, I do want to express my special thanks to Celia for always listening to my random archival finds and joining me in celebrating the seasons, Paul for the best conversations on imperialism and food, and Marcella for always reading and hyping up my work, even when I was feeling overwhelmed and insecure.

Over the years, I was lucky enough to become part of several other communities, too, which never failed to inspire me. I am particularly grateful for my cohort at the Huizinga Institute, my fellow board members at the Netherlands American Studies Association, and the countless scholars I have crossed paths with at the conferences I attended over the years. Likewise, my thanks go out to the esteemed historians and other scholars who were willing to meet and discuss my project with me, including Kate Quinn, Anne-Marie Angelo, Margo Groenewoud, Lianne Leonora, Lisenne Delgado, and Gert Oostindie. Equally as meaningful were my exchanges with fellow PhD candidates working on the Dutch Caribbean, including Rosa de Jong and Jan Bant, who also helped me translate some complex Papiamentu texts. Masha danki!

One of the most exciting aspects of this project was that it gave me the opportunity to travel across the Atlantic in search of new stories. Reflecting on these journeys, I have particularly fond memories of the archivists at the Mongui Maduro Library in Curaçao, the National Archives at College Park in the United States, and the International Institute for Social History in Amsterdam. Even more so, I am eternally grateful to Sanne van den Bergh and Lucien Karg for welcoming me into their homes and sharing with me the personal papers and memories of their parents. Moreover, I would like to thank my friends Katie, Erica, and Nicole for hosting me during some of my trips, as well as my father, Johan, who came with me to Suriname to drive me around and join me on jungle hikes, swamp tours, and more. I am so glad we got to spend this time together.

Then of course there are so many others who have been there for me along the way. My mother, Jaike, who has followed my academic career with such enthusiasm. My friends, who had to be so patient with me during these hectic years, yet always had my back. And, above all, my incredible partner Sean, who never once doubted my ability to get any of this done. Thank you for providing some much-needed stability through seven moves, endless early mornings, and so many stressful periods. I feel fortunate to have you by my side.

On a final note, I would like to express my gratitude to all of those who have, over the past decades, made an effort to preserve the stories told in this dissertation, especially within the Caribbean communities that lie at the heart of it. While I may never know exactly who you are, I know I could not have finished this project without your labor. Please know that your efforts have not gone unnoticed. This dissertation is dedicated to you.
