Propositions relating to the dissertation

1. Labour is the foremost key element in production.
2. The meeting of unlike cultures is certain in the current globalised world. Mechanisms therefore need to be put in place to enable the navigation of diverse spaces to steer them towards sustainable co-habitation.
3. Women gendered labour and how it contributes to the structured monetary economy is still largely unrecognised in non-academic spaces in Africa.
4. The subaltern experience should foreword grand historical narratives.

Propositions relating to broader academic discipline

1. The broader public should be informed of the basis for the policy issues regarding mobility and labour markets, and particularly in today's globalised world.
2. African researchers' capacity is restricted by international mobility laws and visa regimes
3. The archives in African countries are in a crisis.
4. Global trends in research funding whereby the Humanities and Social Sciences are overlooked in favour of STEM (Science, Technology, Engineering and Mathematics) is detrimental to the development of epistemic curiosity and hence, blocks paths of exploration.

Other propositions

1. The individualised world is detrimental to humanity. The world needs community.
2. To experience the fullness of life, one must indulge in at least one personal "bad habit".
