Acknowledgements

I owe thanks to many people for this dissertation, including:

My supervisors: To Sabine Luning, who, to my deep sorrow, passed away during this project. For all the polder walks with her, and inspirational talks. To Gerard Persoon, for his friendly and constructive approach. And to Paul Vedder, for always responding swiftly with often sharp, but helpful feedback.

All the stakeholders in this research, including the teachers, students, and parents at Gamot Cogon Waldorf School. To Max van der Made, for his inspiration. To Jim Sharman, for his warm welcome. To the ATT-trainers, for letting me accompany them. And to Sophie Westhoff, for travelling with me and our many reflective afternoons, beer in hand, discussing the research.

To my dear colleagues at Leiden University and Marecollege for all the advice and support. To friends and family for checking in now and then – but not too often! – and for giving me the space and trust I needed. In particular, I thank my parents, for their endless support in word and deed, including regularly taking care of the children so that I could sit down and write.

To my wife, Irene, who throughout all of this has been endlessly patient and consistently supportive. It was she who gave me a meaningful look at that friend's wedding... (see Preface).

And, lastly, to my children, for just being the light of my life, for whom it has always been entirely normal that, now and then, their dad would be upstairs typing away at a book.

Thank you all!

Curriculum Vitae

Thijs Jan van Schie, born in 1980 in Haarlem, attended Waldorf Schools in Leiden and the Hague. After a travelling through Australia and Southeast Asia, he began studying Cultural Anthropology and Development Sociology at Leiden University in 2000. During his studies, Thijs Jan participated in research projects in Vietnam (2003) and Chile (2004-2005) and taught cultural anthropology courses at Leiden University and the Rotterdam University of Applied Sciences (2005-2006). In 2006, he graduated in both Cultural Anthropology and Development Sociology, and in Education, with a specialization in teaching Social Studies. Since 2005, he has worked as a teacher at Marecollege, a Waldorf school in Leiden. In 2009, Thijs Jan took a sabbatical from Marecollege to work at the Catholic University of Malawi, contributing to a pioneering cultural anthropology programme. In 2011-2012, he worked at Hanoi Medical University, on behalf of the Medical Committee Netherlands-Vietnam, to develop and introduce a course on Medical Anthropology for six Vietnamese universities. On his return, Thijs Jan resumed his work at Marecollege, combining it with teaching at Leiden University, where he was also an internship coordinator and career coach for anthropology students. In 2016, he started his PhD project after receiving the NWO Doctoral Grant for Teachers. Between 2016 and 2020, he travelled four times to the Philippines for this research.

In 2022, Thijs Jan took on a new role at Marecollege as part of the school management team, where he contributes to school policies and oversees student progress, curriculum development, and the staff working within his section, the middle school (grades 7 and 8). Thijs Jan van Schie lives in Noordwijkerhout and is married to Irene ten Teije. They have two children: a daughter, Nora (8), and a son, Flore (5).
