Acknowledgments

Infinite words of gratitude go to Professors Nanne Timmer and Frans-Willem Korsten, who have supervised this thesis, who never let me down, unconditionally supported my ideas, and who are surely the most perfect supervisors one could imagine. I thank Nanne for getting me started and Frans-Willem for helping me finish. Without Frans-Willem, I would most likely have been condemned to poverty, certainly intellectually, but also materially. He helped me to get a job in academia, so that I could make a living and write this thesis. Nanne, who has an extraordinary taste for the Latin American picaresque, has recommended important sources for the thesis. Both Nanne and Frans-Willem also helped me to get a fellowship of six months, during which most of the thesis has been written. I would like to thank the Leiden University Center for Arts in Society for awarding me this fellowship for the completion of the manuscript. I would like to thank Thomas Bragdon and Nike van Helden, who have read and commented on several chapters during the writing process, and who have been my friends and companions during my Ph.D. at Leiden University. During various sessions at Nanne Timmer's dissertation writing workshop, Dennis Bus has given me valuable comments on my writing. My lifelong friend, Navid Naderi, has edited the manuscript, and has always been an important interlocutor during my academic career. The ideas of Professor Timothy Brennan (University of Minnesota) and Professor Marc Caplan (Dartmouth College) have been crucial sources of inspiration for this dissertation. Their classes at the University of Minnesota and the Johns Hopkins University have paved the way for my most recent academic trajectory. I thank Professor Rochelle Tobias (Johns Hopkins University) for reading and commenting on parts of the second chapter of this thesis. Two philosophy graduates from The Johns Hopkins University, Anton Kabeshkin and Arash Abazari have fueled my interest in Hegel and Marx during various conversations in Baltimore. Jorge Durán Solorzano, a friend and colleague at Leiden University, has engaged with me in various conversations about philosophy, society and the state. Finally, Gabriel Inzaurrealde has been an important interlocutor in conversations on literature, Latin American culture, and radical politics. Last but not least, I thank my mother for her limitless patience, and for letting me play, always.
